Existence based Human Centric Contemplation

Prelude

It's not definite when humans first appeared on Earth, but we have no doubt about whether humans exist or not, as we ourselves are living evidence of that. However, the question of what it truly means to be human eludes us to this day. Throughout history, humans have tirelessly endeavoured to explore and comprehend the depths of their inner selves. Our quest to unravel our identity has spanned millennia, yet we continue to thirst for understanding. Despite the vast array of advancements in material science, the study of the human being remains elusive. Countless research efforts have been devoted to this pursuit, yet a comprehensive understanding of the human being has remained beyond our grasp.

A. Nagraj is an individual like one of us; he embarked on a journey to the solitude of Amarkantak in search of understanding human nature. Amarkantak, renowned as a pilgrimage site in India, marks the origin of the river Narmada. Shree Nagraj, who we now call Baba ji, left his village Agrahar in Mysore province and came here in search of answers to some questions. Undeterred by the challenges he faced—dense forests, harsh weather, wild animals, scarcity of food, and various discomforts—he persisted in his quest. Initiated by Shree Chandrashekhar Bharti, the Shankaracharya of the famous Sringeri Math, Shree Nagraj ji carried on with his austerities according to traditional methods. Through unwavering dedication, he eventually attained a state of samadhi. Yet, finding no answers to his inquiries in this state, he pursued 'samyama'. Baba ji understood existence as coexistence as a result of this pursuit. In coexistence, he understood humans as a combined form of jeevan and body. The realisation of the sentient and insentient nature being saturated in the omnipresent power (Omnipotence), which we call by names such as God, Truth, Brahma, etc., also happened. The entire orderliness in existence was understood. He saw that all of nature is submerged, soaked, and surrounded by Omnipotence (Paramatma).

From the year 1976 onwards, he started sharing his realisations with those who came to him. During this period, notable scientists such as Dr. C.V. Raman and Dr. Homi Bhabha, the president of the Atomic Energy Commission, sought his audience. Simultaneously, ordinary villagers, often deemed illiterate, also sought his guidance. He began expounding the Truth, sharing profound insights with those who listened. As people grasped the truths he articulated, some started disseminating this wisdom through workshops titled "Jeevan Vidya".

We implored Baba ji to elucidate his understanding of existence and jeevan so that an authentic document could be created for humanity. In response, Baba ji presented Jeevan Vidya over a three-day period at Anwari Ashram, near Charama, in the Bastar district of Madhya Pradesh.

The presentation was recorded on video, and it was decided to publish it in book form to ensure that this message reaches everyone. With this intention, Baba ji's discourse on 'Jeevan Vidya' is presented in this book. We are filled with immense joy today as we offer this book to humanity. We hope and believe that this book will be instrumental in dispelling delusions about the self and existence.

Translator's Note

Dear Brothers and Sisters,

It is my great pleasure to offer you the English translation of “Jeevan Vidya – Ek Parichaya”. It was originally narrated in Hindi by Baba ji (Shree A Nagraj) about his life journey and realisation to a small gathering at Anwari Ashram, Bastar Distt C.G. in 1997. This introductory book gives a glimpse of Madhyasth Darshan Co-existentialism, which he has propounded and positioned as the alternative (vikalp) of idealism and materialism.

I started working on the English translation of Madhyasth Darshan literature from 2007 on Baba ji's suggestion. Translation will help in your study, he had said. I also needed a way to make myself useful. This book is an expression of my gratitude toward him. I have translated this book in my capacity as a student of this Darshan.

Baba ji used to say, “Truth can be communicated in words to those who want to understand.” Based on this premise, he presented his realisation in Truth to the world in the form of literature. He wrote Madhyasth Darshan in the Hindi language. If Truth can be communicated in one language, then it should be possible to communicate it in all languages. All languages, therefore, would mean the same when they communicate the Truth. This is an effort to make a bridge to Madhyasth Darshan for the English speaking world. It is a Hindi-English combined edition, with original Hindi text on the left as a reference and translated English text on the right.

This book has undergone a thorough peer review for more than a year by Shree Puneet Chawla (Delhi), Shree Sanjeev Chopra (Delhi), and Shree Surendra Pal (Raipur). I have respect and gratitude for their understanding, commitment and consistent effort, which has helped in improving this book's accuracy and readability. All of us in the review team feel that our understanding has improved from this collaborative exercise. We feel this translation will still undergo revisions in future, as we improve our understanding and learn from the feedback we receive.

I want to also thank Shree B R Agrawal (Raipur) and Shree Suryakant Agrawal (Raipur) for their support in the publication. It is an honour to have this book published by Divya Path Sansthan, which is responsible for publishing all Madhyasth Darshan literature of Baba ji. I want to express my gratitude to Shree Sadhan Bhattacharya (Manav Teerth, Kiritpur), who has provided clarification from time to time for furthering my understanding. My sincere gratitude to all Jeevan Vidya family who provided useful suggestions, encouragement and support for this work. My sincere gratitude to Baba ji's family at Amarkantak who have been serving tirelessly for furthering this Darshan. Lastly, I want to express gratitude to my family, which has always been a pillar of strength and support for me.

It is my hope that the tone, intent and content of the original book gets conveyed through this effort. I take full responsibility for this translation, and am committed to its improvement.

Jeevan Vidya: An Introduction

My fellow humans! I listened to the ancient Vedic scriptures of my own volition, with no pressure from anyone. Upon understanding these scriptures, a wish arose within me for how humans on this Earth should be. This is the proclamation that emerged from within me: "May the Earth be heaven, May humans be deities, May dharma prevail, May goodness be eternal."

May the Earth be heaven, May humans be deities,
May dharma prevail, May goodness be eternal.

I want to share the background of how this arose. This bodily journey of mine began in a hard-working, selflessly serving, pious, and reverential family in the Vedic tradition. As you are all aware, every child that is born follows the faith of their parents, accepts the constitution of one nation or another, receives the education available in their tradition, and tries to follow the path set out by their teachers. I too started going through all these at the place and family where I was born. Furthermore, there were dictates and sanctions of tradition like, "Sit with these people, don't sit with those." "Do this, don't do that." From the beginning and throughout my childhood, I was dissatisfied with such dogmas. At first, my elders thought all this was due to my young age. However, as time passed, their attitude towards me started changing. I felt my elders were unhappy with me; the first cause of my questioning became this. But how was I to make them happy! If I did as they said, I couldn't keep myself from testing them against their own standards. I could see that my elders were not always happy while living with those protocols. That was the crux point. I started feeling that while my elders instructed me on what to do and what not to do, whether they themselves did those things or not, they were not happy all the time. Even though it was not possible to find more reverential or bigger scholars of scriptures than them anywhere. As a result of this situation, I concluded that I would never blindly follow the dictates and sanctions of tradition. It started becoming like a sacred oath for me. Another factor that got added to this was that my elders could not make me understand. All in all, the more they failed, the more my conceit grew. The growth in my conceit and my not adhering to the stereotypes happened simultaneously. What could we have done if we continued in this manner?

Now, my elders began claiming that I hadn't understood the Vedas, Vedanta, and scriptures. They worried, "He rejects everything in a self-proclaimed manner; how far can this be right?" This became the cause of my second question. Now, what could I do? With no other way left, I chose to study Vedanta, which they believed to be the supreme knowledge.

The first stage is Vedanta – which is the karma of Vedic ideology. According to the Vedic ideology, karma is that which begets heaven, and all the rest is called something else. Upasana refers to the rituals and ceremonies for becoming deities, known as Vedic worship. In the third aspect, it is said that knowledge alone is supreme. When I asked, "What is knowledge?" The answer was "Knowledge of Brahma." "Then what is Brahma?" I inquired. They replied, "You won't understand." Without understanding, how will we overcome it? They assured that adhering to the dictates and sanctions of the scriptures is the way. My elders then assured me that one gets the answers to all questions in the state of samadhi. Thus, I concluded that I must see the state of samadhi for myself. There was no other option left for me. There was no point in arguing anymore. Agreeing or disagreeing with them now was of no consequence. I had to find the answers to my questions. After thoroughly listening to Vedanta, the first question that formed in me was: What is bandhan (bondage) and what is moksha (liberation)? They say that we live in bandhan due to maya. Moksha is the dissolution of atma into Brahma. Where did atma come from? They say, "Brahma itself resides in the heart of jeeva in the form of atma." If atma has to ultimately dissolve into Brahma for the liberation of jeeva, ending the cycles of birth-death and its trips to heaven and hell, then why did Brahma bother to go and sit in the hearts of jeeva in the first place? When the first jeeva came into existence, it had no atma in it, so what was the need for Brahma to go and sit inside it? My questioning seemed like being the devil's advocate. As I didn't echo my elders, they called me the devil's advocate. I said, "You may be right, but you should still answer my questions." But I didn't get the answer to these questions. After this,

I was told that the answers would also be found in the state of samadhi. What else could be done? I gradually began to prepare my mind for samadhi.

All of this began in 1944, and by 1946 I had become mentally prepared to pursue samadhi. It was also the time when the conditions for Indian Independence were becoming ripe. Then, as many of us had anticipated, the power got transferred from the British to the Indian people in 1947. There were some great visionaries and thinkers involved in the independence movement, but I also observed some detrimental changes that happened in them along with this success. This, too, caused me pain. After that, one more hope got kindled. It was the hope that we (the Indian Nation) would now have our own constitution, and perhaps that constitution would provision evaluation of an authentic human. I kept thinking and hoping that the constitution would show the way.

I used to avidly follow newspaper reports regarding the formulation of the constitution. By the year 1950, after having considered all the discussions, I concluded that it was impossible to evaluate an authentic human under this constitution. This conclusion was based on the fact that it had no description of the authentic human character, which could be called the national character. So, what could be done now? I had already accepted that all my questions on Vedanta would be answered in samadhi. I concluded that this question would also get answered in that state. There was no need to argue with elders and scholars over this matter anymore. I decided that either I would get all my answers in samadhi, or I would consider my life an offering for learning.

One more person became ready to accompany me in this endeavour - my wife. We had heard of Amarkantak as a sacred place from where the holy river Narmada originates. With this noble thought in mind, we decided to make one last attempt there and made the journey to Amarkantak. After arriving, I started my sadhana using the Agama Tantra Upasana method. This method, as prescribed in the scriptures, aims for attaining samadhi by visualising all the deities in every part of one's body. It involves using one's imaginativeness to visualise and then worship these deities. This process of envisioning deities in different parts of one's body is called "nyas". The underlying formula provided in the scriptures for this practice is 'देवोभूत्वा देवान् यजेत्', which means, "you become like gods to worship gods." All of this was conveyed to me, and I prepared myself to follow it with complete honesty. I did my best to adhere to it. Eventually, one day, I became free from the imagined proximity of the deities. The awareness of "I am" remained. There were no other thoughts.

I had no thought of achieving something, having something, or doing something in that state. This was something new, a small event perhaps, which occurred. This state remained for a few hours after the event. When I became aware of my body and time, I realised that I had no awareness of these three things during that period. I had no thoughts at all in that state. I became convinced that this had happened to me. After this, I started thinking that I had achieved the state of samadhi. I began repeating this state of samadhi every day for several hours, anticipating that my questions would be answered. However, even after years of waiting, I did not get answers to my questions. This was the second failure. I did not get answers from understanding Vedanta, and I did not get answers after achieving samadhi. Even the highest scholars in my family could not provide any answers. Where could I go now? There was no point in blaming anyone, and so I continued living through this deadlock.

I had heard all about samadhi, and one day I had become confident that I had attained it as well, but how would I be able to tell others that this indeed was the state of samadhi? How could I ascertain its firmness and what should I consider as its evidence? There was nothing to describe in the state of samadhi; how could I present its evidence? This curiosity deepened, and to test whether I had attained the state of samadhi, I performed a practice called samyama. This advice was also given by our ancestors. It is mentioned in Patanjali's Yoga Sutra – “धारणा ध्यान समाधि त्रयमेकवृत्तात् संयमाः” – These three – dharana, dhyana, and samadhi – when practised concerning one object, is samyama. Anyone can verify this reference. I could not agree with what was written about samyama. Hence, I devised my own design and method of samyama and subsequently carried it out. As a result of practising samyama, I started seeing every bit of existence in front of me. Here, seeing means understanding.

I have sequentially and systematically observed all the processes that have taken place in emergence from a single atom to the vast earth. I have achieved a state where I can impart this understanding to you. Along with this, I also saw the ‘jeevan atom’ in the sequence of atoms. The ‘jeevan atom’ is the same in me, in you, in a newborn person, and even when it is without a body. I realised that jeevan exists both with and without a body. Why does it exist with a body? I will explain that later when the context arises.

I saw that ‘jeevan’ wants to evidence itself in the human tradition through the body. That is the only formula here. What does jeevan want to evidence? The answer I found is that jeevan first wants to live and then, along with living, wants to become happy. Along with being happy, it also wants to evidence itself. These are the three stages. The first stage of wanting to live is fulfilled in the animal order itself. The next two stages of wanting happiness and evidencing can be accomplished only in humans and nowhere else. I have seen this very thoroughly. I found this immensely satisfying. After that, in the same vein, I discovered the formula for living with happiness – “living in orderliness with resolution”.

The insentient world, which we call material order and biological order, exists in solid, liquid, and gaseous states. I realised that there is a combination of a great many rasa and rasayan at the root of numerous formations of biological cells. Whatever else humans are to do, they will keep doing. I saw that the composition of the body is only from the combination of these substances. Both animal and human bodies are composed only of physicochemical substances. The essential difference I saw between animal and human bodies is that the brain becomes fully enriched only in the human body. Being enriched means the human brain has the capability for jeevan to evidence itself in a multi-faceted way. I have seen this precisely.

After seeing all of this, it occurred to me that animal-kind is in its orderliness, which is explained and clearly defined. Similarly, I realised that humans too are clearly defined and explained in the form of “inherent orderliness”, and they could live happily by living in this manner. Along with this, I also found the answers to what exactly is moksba? What is bandhan? In this state, I found the answer to the questions that led me to this endeavour. I found that jeevan drives a human body in order to evidence itself. What is to be evidenced? As mentioned earlier, it is to evidence happiness. What is needed to evidence happiness? One needs to become wise. Humans shall evidence orderliness and happiness with understanding, and they will not be able to do it in any other way. While I was doing sadhana, everybody used to say that I live with such great discipline, restraint, and precision. Hordes of people used to come to see me, but I bear witness that my mind had no restraint in the initial stages of sadhana. Until I attained samadhi, I did not have any mental restraint.

I had only one resolve that I am here to do sadhana, and I am not to do anything silly. But it was not that the silly thoughts didn't arise in my mind at all. On this basis, I can claim that until one attains the state of samadhi, there is no method in existence for not having silly thoughts. Humans naturally don't want absurdity or such thoughts, and the one doing sadhana definitely does not want them. I also did not want them, yet they kept coming. This difficulty is faced by all who practise sadhana. As long as the practitioner can tolerate this, they persist with sadhana, and when they cannot, they don't. That's all I can say in its final analysis.

Now I found the answer to what is bandhan and what is moksha. Bandhan is ignorance or delusion. What is ignorance? To live like animals. How can we consider animal behaviour to be evidence for humans? If we assume animal living to be the evidence and model human living according to that, then that would be a delusion for humans. Traditions compel us to live with ignorance. Its testimony is sex-obsessed psychology, consumption-obsessed sociology, and profit-obsessed economics in the present education. It is ironic that in the midst of this, people bless their children to become good, moral, cultured, joyous and gentle! What is the correlation here? What is the correlation between what we teach our children and what we bless them to become?

I found the answer to my second question about national character as well. What did I find? Each unit in existence has inherent orderliness and participates in the overall orderliness. I found the path for humans to achieve this as well. I discovered the definition of human being. Awakened human being's work and behaviour is the embodiment of "humaneness". When we articulate this work and behaviour, it is called sociology or constitution. I understood that imparting the understanding of humane conduct is the essence of sociology. In this way, I found answers to both my questions. The constitution shall provide the code of conduct of humaneness. We can recognise the national character in the form of the constitution. Further, when we become liberated from delusion, we can live as humans ought to live – this itself is moksha. We don't need to turn ice into stone or stone into water. We don't need to give ritual blessings to anyone or perform any miracles or demonstrate supernatural feats. There are no miracles or supernatural feats in existence. I have seen it precisely. Even today, there are millions of people trapped in the vicious cycle of curse and grace.

There is only one answer to this, the moment we take a single step in the direction of awakening, from that moment all the curse, remorse, and sin gets shattered. No taint of these remains. This can be illustrated by the analogy of how we learn mathematics. One could do a math question wrong a thousand times but once one has learnt to do it right, then it becomes right for one's whole life. As long as one keeps making mistakes, each mistake is different until one learns the right method. If a math problem is given to a million children and they all solve it correctly, they will all arrive at the same answer. If they all get it wrong, we could get a million different wrong answers. Any common person can easily do this survey. With this, I discovered one more formula – We humans are united in the right and divided in the wrong.

Existence has only two kinds of realities. First, there are things that can be counted as units, which we call Nature. Second, there is a reality that pervades everywhere, which anyone can understand in a moment. Each unit of nature is soaked, surrounded and submerged in this second reality. This can be called Omnipresence. There are two kinds of entities (units) – insentient and sentient. Sentient entities mean animal-kind and humankind, and insentient entities mean material order and biological order. Insentient entities include all the minerals, soils, metals and formations of biological cells. All of these are soaked, submerged and surrounded in Omnipresence. I have seen this precisely. There is no provision in existence to separate units of nature from Omnipresence. Humans cannot create that for which there is no provision in existence.

If humans accomplish anything contrary to the usefulness of what is provisioned in existence, it results in nothing but devastation. For instance, we used so many resources for war, but we could accomplish nothing other than the destruction of Earth and humans through this. Perhaps the scientific community is slowly recognising this. If they had recognised it sooner, humans could have become happy and prosperous. Perhaps it was bound to happen in this way – like the river that crosses many banks before it meets the ocean. First, humans had to go through mystical idealism – but the relief found here proved insufficient. After that, they found themselves in the clutches of materialism again. The relief that they found here also proved inadequate in terms of happiness and prosperity. This is the painful situation of today.

We didn't find complete relief from either of these and so naturally there is a need for a third step. In this way, the answer that I found to the question of bandhan and moksha is - “Humans become liberated from bondage upon becoming wise.” Now, how can one become wise? In the course of examining what I had seen, I asked - what delusion do I have? I explored within “myself”, I verified within “myself” and I found that there is no cause of bondage within me. So why not work so that this state arises in everyone! What would it be like if this happens? Then the proclamation that I had shared with you will come true. Earth will become heavenly, humans will become deities, dharma will prevail, and goodness will be eternal. The tradition of eternal goodness will be established. Thus, I began examining myself by asking: Will I be able to convey this knowledge? Do people have a need for it or not? Thus began what we now know as Jeevan Vidya.

The point when I became confident (about the Jeevan Vidya program) was when I realised that “the code of humane conduct” can be incorporated into the Constitution. A humane national character will become evident as a result. I am definite about this. I am myself proficient and living evidence of this knowledge. I have understood ‘existence’ and I can impart that understanding to you. I have understood ‘jeevan’ and I can impart that understanding to you. I have understood ‘humane conduct’ and I can impart that understanding to you. One becomes wise upon understanding these three truths. What happens upon becoming wise? One becomes liberated from bondage. What is this bondage? Bondage is in the form of delusion. Our ancestors spoke about liberation from the cycle of birth and death. The cycle of birth and death has nothing to do with liberation. Nothing arrives at birth nor does anything depart with death. All that is, exists forever.

Jeevan continues to exist even after death as it does while driving a body. A piece of charcoal continues to exist in other forms even after burning it. The scholars of physics and chemistry would have understood this, and if they haven't, they are bound to, as is everyone else. This is how one arrives at the understanding of truth. At the fundamental level, a 'reality' never gets annihilated. Therefore, if Earth remains healthy, and humans can live in orderliness, this would be the basis of universal and eternal wellbeing. This wish of mine for universal goodness rests primarily on the principle of humane conduct. Humane conduct is the main pillar on which this wish of mine for universal goodness rests.

The big benefit from this understanding will be that humans shall live on this Earth forever - without wounding it, without tearing its guts apart, and without destroying it. The way of such living also emerges from this very understanding. Earth needs to first heal itself. Whatever untoward events that humans have caused in their history until now, all those are results of their ignorance. Humans inflicted wounds on Earth, tore its guts apart, caused it fever and deformed its surface in many ways. As a result, rivers and streams got destroyed, air and water became polluted, and we all know the immense suffering it has caused to humans. If Earth suffers, then all of the flora, fauna, and humans that reside upon it are bound to suffer as well. You can very well imagine what kind of people would have envisaged health and happiness by wounding the planet.

The silver lining in the cloud is that if we stop disturbing its natural balance, then it is reassuring to know that the resources on Earth's surface are abundant enough for all humans to live on it. Mistakes, crimes, revolts, and rebellions are the outcomes of human ignorance, not understanding, which is evident as the imbalance everywhere. Humans, along with Earth, rivers, streams, hills, and forests, have all become imbalanced. We humans committed all these crimes during the scientific age, yet we haven't stopped boasting about science! We think science will find a lasting solution to this situation, even though the human race is on the verge of being wiped out from Earth. We need to pay attention to this. Humans will have to become wise whenever they decide to avert this problem. There is no other way.

Crimes cannot be controlled through lack of understanding, constitutional means or otherwise; a crime is still a crime. All the nations on this Earth have their respective Constitutions. Each of these Constitutions has three main agendas and a common theme - 'Power-Centric Rule'. Power-Centric Rule gets implemented in the form of three activities - stopping one mistake by making another mistake, stopping one crime by committing another crime, and stopping one war by waging another war. Yet there is no evidence anywhere if these three actions could rid us of crimes. Rather with every passing day, month, year, century, these three have only been increasing. History is full of accounts of wars becoming fiercer, crimes getting more prevalent, and one mistake leading to another. The pages of history give testimony of this.

If we search for the root cause, we find that humans alone are responsible for creating these circumstances. Another significant factor is the 'religious constitution'. All religions believe that humans are fundamentally sinners, ignorant, and selfish. However, the reality is different from this. To deliver sinners, turn the ignorant into wise, and the selfish into charitable, each religion prescribes its methods, ideals, duties, responsibilities, and rituals. This is very much apparent. What has been the net outcome of these efforts? So far, there is no evidence of any ignorant person becoming wise, any selfish person becoming charitable, or any sinner being emancipated as a result of these efforts.

I had mentioned earlier that sadhana is performed until samadhi is achieved. During this period, there is no resolution in thoughts, and the mind remains perturbed since it is suffering from problems that drive one towards samadhi in the first place. The greatness of a human being is seen only in terms of their sincere efforts until samadhi. During sadhana, one may get all kinds of silly thoughts, which get extinguished after samadhi. The alternative path is - perform study, attain mastery, then evidence it in living.

It has also been observed that after attaining the state of samadhi, a human being has no desire to do anything, achieve anything, or keep anything. So, how did I develop the desire to present all this? I have already mentioned to you that my pursuit of samadhi was not for liberation or heaven; it was to find answers to my questions. When I did not find answers in the state of samadhi, I began scrutinising whether I had truly attained samadhi or not. During this scrutiny, I understood all these concepts. This understanding emerged due to the good deeds of humans, for their future, and for universal well-being. It has not come out of books. This is a fact. My elders had guided me only to the extent that I would find the answer in the state of samadhi. To validate whether I had attained samadhi, I performed samyama, and on that basis, these insights emerged. Human understanding has evolved in a successive manner. History documents how humans lived in the jungle age, the stone age, and the iron age. Many people found relief with the advent of the age of kingdoms. The promise was that the king would ensure the security of life and property, but that hasn't happened until now. Life and property remain insecure; peace and harmony are further still. It is natural for every family and sect to be concerned about the security of their life & property and for peace & harmony.

Similarly, idealism emerged, but whatever relief people found in it proved insufficient over time. When this became inadequate, it was natural to reconsider, leading to the advent of science as a way of thinking. Previously, there was no room for logic in the sermonising of idealism. Idealism imposed dos and don'ts, labelling non-believers as sinners and subjecting them to harassment, as documented in history. Science was embraced because of its logical nature and its invitation to reason. Moreover, the imagined heaven and the desire for happiness began to materialise as people started to benefit from various amenities provided by science. People enjoyed these benefits extensively, but eventually, scientific achievements also proved insufficient. Once again, humans began to feel restricted. Thus, they oscillate between devotion-detachment and comfort-accumulation. They pursue devotion-detachment when tired of comfort-accumulation, and when disillusioned from devotion-detachment, they revert to comfort-accumulation. Both these pursuits may feel good in themselves, but there is a distinction between "feeling good" and "being good". Just because something feels good doesn't mean that it is good. For instance, drinking cold water may feel good, but it is not a law that cold water is always good. Someone could fall ill from drinking cold water, or develop a cough from it. Therefore, both cold water's feeling good or its not feeling good cannot be universal. This pertains to conduciveness for the body.

Due to the ideology of science, we are drifting towards instability and uncertainty. Scientists have unsuccessfully attempted to describe humans as machines. The scientists who describe humans as machines themselves remain dissatisfied with that description. Nowadays, understanding the mechanical functioning of humans is a major topic of scientific research. Scientists believe that this understanding will accelerate human behaviour, work, and thinking. However, humans do not fit into this framework. Science assumes the accuracy of the mechanistic view, which humans can comprehend and deal with. Idealists, on the other hand, have advocated the suppression of sensitivity, believing that humans cannot understand or withstand sensitivity. Thus, the gap between the two ideologies remains unchanged. Consequently, humans have become ensnared in problems one after another, reaching the end of life with these problems only. All in all, this is the way we have reached our present condition.

The proposal I am presenting before humanity, I believe, is the result of the virtuous acts of the entire human race. If I were to assess my own effort for this, it is not worthy of such a significant result (which I have achieved). It is akin to a one-tonne fruit growing on a tree; the tree itself would break apart if that were to happen. A similar event has occurred with me. This discovery is greater than my individual effort. The main point is - who is the bearer of this effort? I have precisely observed that the entity that bears results in excess of effort in humans. Jeevan is the bearer. Jeevan is capable of carrying such results. How? I have seen jeevan in the form of inexhaustible strength and power. I can teach you to see this as well. If you have the quest, you can also understand it and then impart that understanding to others. I am confident that you need to understand this, so you will eventually come around to it. It is clear that whatever jeevan does through the body, the result of it always turns out to be more than the needs of the body. It is a natural process. I have seen jeevan, and I have seen humans as a combined form of jeevan and body.

So far, humans were unable to elucidate consciousness and existence by the method of study. Wherever science has attempted to enlighten people about existence, it has consistently revealed instability and uncertainty, fostering notions of struggle and obsessions with profit, consumption, and sex. We humans kept accepting these ideas, but even after living accordingly, they did not become the basis of our satisfaction. The testimony to this is that the point of satisfaction of comfort and accumulation could not be determined. Hence, we have been living with an internal conflict with these ideas. Now, it is imperative to comprehend the proposition being presented here. Just as I validate it through my own living, you too must undertake this validation. Upon finding satisfaction in living accordingly, you will naturally feel compelled to impart this understanding to others. The proof of our comprehension lies in our ability to convey it to others; this is the litmus test of our wisdom. My realisation is from having seen coexistence. Humans can experience prosperity in coexistence by producing more than the needs of their families. This understanding shall manifest itself only as resolution in every aspect of behaviour. I have witnessed the interconnectedness of these three, and how our consciousness expands in the course of teaching and evidencing these, even though the physical expanse of the body remains limited. This proposal has ideas that extend far beyond the physical expanse of a human being. Every human has that ability and longing for kindling enthusiasm for this understanding in them. That's the essence and purpose of this proposal.

Science is a step in itself; its preceding step was idealism, which in turn followed the step of the village and tribal world. Further back, humans wandered in the jungles during the Stone Age. We have progressed step by step to reach where we are today. We should acknowledge the contribution of each step and be grateful for them. Here, I have provided a general sequence of events that serve as the backdrop to this discovery. In summary, I did not find satisfaction in the finest offerings from tradition. I accepted that I am a responsible person, and thus it is my responsibility to find answers to my questions. Consequently, I endeavoured for this and not for anything else. Through this intellectual effort, I realised that all humans can be happy, dharma can prevail, Earth can become heavenly, and humans can become deities. This motivation led me to present this discovery to humanity, which is what I am currently doing.

Upon completely understanding existence, jeevan and humane conduct, I achieved a state which I will now describe to you. I attained confidence within myself after understanding. I didn't have to exert any effort for it. I started verifying this confidence in all aspects of my living as well. In the same way, the respect for excellence also became feasible. I could evaluate excellence, which naturally results in having respect for it. We cannot respect what we do not evaluate. Thirdly, I comfortably integrated this understanding into my personality. I didn't face any difficulty like I will not be able to live based on this understanding by way of harmony in jeevan and existence. I called this balance between talent and personality. I could meet this criterion truly and fully. Fourthly, I became social in behaviour. I started getting satisfaction within myself from becoming social. As a benefit, I was left with no complaints with the world. Now every moment I keep scrutinizing the meaningfulness of my actions. I live meaningfully by fulfilling duties and responsibilities in all my relationships. Fifthly, I attained prosperity. Though I was born in a hardworking family and I knew how to do physical labour and seva, but I didn't then really understand the meaning of prosperity. The meaning of prosperity was understood now. We produce more than the needs of our family to experience prosperity. In this manner, I acquired many wonderful qualities, which collectively I have called "autonomy". I attained autonomy within myself; therefore, which you can also attain.

Once we attain autonomy, we can express, teach and offer this understanding to the world. As a result, I began articulating it in the form of literature. I titled this literature Madhyasth Darshan Sab-Astitva-Vad (Co-existentialism).

Madhyasth Darshan has been presented in four parts. The first part has been named – The Holistic view of Human Behaviour (Manav Vyavhar Darshan). The name of the second part is – The Holistic view of Human Action (Manav Karma Darshan). The name of the third part is – The Holistic view of Human Practice (Manav Abhyas Darshan). The name of the fourth part is – The Holistic view of Human Realisation (Manav Anubhav Darshan).

In this manner, I wrote the entire Madhyasth Darshan in four parts. There are generative, degenerative and mediative powers or motions in existence, which have their respective outcomes. Among these, establishing the magnificence of mediative strength and power is the wonderful goal of humankind. I too was very amazed upon seeing this. Anyone who has gotten its sense - whether scientist, scholar or commoner - becomes amazed.

The scientists are in the position of accepting the generative and degenerative powers in nature, but so far, they have not been able to understand the mediative strength and power in the form of purpose. I think this has been a huge oversight and error. Therefore, now the need has come to rethink, whereby we have worked here to understand and expound the mediative force, the mediative power, the mediative omnipotence, and the mediative jeevan, and called it “Madhyasth Darshan”.

I have explained the co-existentialism ideology under three headings. The first is Resolution centred Materialism (samadhanatmak bhautikvad). Its focal point is: - The entire physical and chemical world is manifested as inherent orderliness and participates in overall orderliness. The insentient nature is participative within itself and is also complementary to the sentient nature.

I have tried to describe it here. The erstwhile ideologies are struggle-centred or conflict-centred materialism. While in the state and motion of coexistence, there is no fight, no revolt, and no snatching or robbing - instead, there is mutual complementariness, celebration, joyousness, and continuous progression. This is what I have tried to explain here. Literature is literally just words! According to me, literature is an attempt, but a human will understand only from another human. Most importantly, here logic has science aligned with wisdom and wisdom aligned with science. Wisdom means recognition of the purpose.

We will analyse something if its purpose is understood and has been recognised. You also know what happens if we keep analysing without understanding the purpose. You can evaluate yourself whether science has taken humankind to great heights or into a vicious trap. Resolution centred Materialism posits that all physical and chemical matter in existence is inspiration for humans to live in orderliness. All units of nature are complementary to one another, mutually helpful for their grandeur, and interrelated for further progression. This is the way resolution is described here.

The name given to the second monograph of co-existentialism is – Behaviour Centred Public Discourse (vyavharatmak janvad). The path to satisfaction is through behaviour only. Behaviour is what one human does with another. Human behaviour becomes defined only in the form of humane conduct, and that's what I have tried to explain here.

After this, I wrote the third monograph, Realisation centred Spiritualism (anubhavatmak adhyatmvad). So far, the world has remained unsuccessful in explaining their belief in spirituality. We can understand spirituality easily in just a few moments. It is the emptiness between you and I, which is also visually apparent; we could call it Space or Void or anything else. It's there between you and me, just as it is between this Earth and other planets. It's also there between one solar system and another, just as it is between one galaxy and another. Space is uniform in all dimensions. Therefore, we come to know that this reality is omnipresent. All entities (units) are submerged, surrounded, and soaked in this omnipresent reality. This itself comes into human realisation first. After that, one realises their own being. Had this space not been between you and me, it wouldn't have been possible for me to realise your existence. Therefore, the very first realisation happens in Omnipresence only. I have tried to explain it here and highlighted the need for its understanding. How will humans understand themselves without understanding existence, of which they are a part? Therefore, understanding existence is essential. All units of nature are in Omnipresence; this itself is the testimony of coexistence. If we overlook the fact that existence is coexistence, it results in nothing apart from problems and suffering. Whatever revolts, rebellions, exploitations, and wars that humans have committed until now, these all were contrary to the principles of coexistence. It is ironic that even after doing all these, we desired and hoped to achieve what is right.

Our hope remained unfulfilled, and we kept facing the consequences of our actions. We laughed and cried amidst this. When one family or community kills someone from the enemy side, they become very happy, thinking they have eliminated their enemy. Governments and nations think in the same way. The seats of religion are also based on this thinking. Now, what should be done? Where can humans take refuge now? In this way, delusion is found everywhere with no direction or purpose, whether it is the seat of religion, the seat of state, the seat of education, or the seat of business. Where should we go? What should we do? These were the difficulties. I too had these difficulties before awakening. Upon awakening, I became fully determined that this whole discovery should reach the entire human race.

After this, I wrote the treatises to describe how this understanding shall manifest itself as the way of life. The erstwhile economic theories are all obsessed with profit. It is very clear that human happiness is not possible through such ideas. The only way to happiness for all humans is through Cyclical Economics (avartansheel arthshastra), which is practical and aligned with the orderliness of nature.

I wrote the second treatise under the title Behavioural Sociology (vyavharvadi samajshastra). Humans find satisfaction only when there is justice in their behaviour with other humans. Humane conduct is the focus here, which can be adopted as a model code of conduct for the nation. Citizens of all nations can accept it as their Constitution. This will lead to the indivisible society and universal system, eliminating the constant fear of war between factions in the world. As long as there are wars, humans will not be able to live without disturbing the balance of Earth, and they will use even more intellect to cause even bigger disturbances. We get an assessment of the scientific intellect when we see that a great deal of science and a great many scientists are currently devoted to the war effort, for which they get money and feel accomplished, even though all this leads to nothing but the destruction of the Earth. We will have to be liberated from this, and for that there is no other way apart from our becoming wise.

The third treatise that I wrote is – Psychology of Humane Consciousness (manav sanchetnavadi manovigyan). It postulates that jeevan is at the root of humane consciousness. The body is its medium for expressing humane consciousness in the sense of completeness in the human tradition. I have tried to explain this here. Now, it is for you to examine.

My writing will be worthwhile if you understand it. In this way, I have offered these three - the holistic view (darshan), the ideology (vaad), and the treatises (shastra). The basic intent of treatises is to describe that humans are to live in orderliness. How should humans live? What is the way? What is the policy? What is the procedure?

These have been explained in the treatises. After this came the plans for their implementation in three forms.

The first plan is the "Jeevan Vidya Plan" (jeevan vidya yojana). Humans have remained ignorant about the self since ancient times. Even in the age of idealism, attempts were made to explain concepts like atma and paramatma through sermons, but they were unsuccessful. This ignorance about the self has been a major source of distress for humans. If the self is understood, then everything that follows will also be understood. The Jeevan Vidya plan is designed to overcome this very hurdle. The central point of this plan is to impart the understanding of jeevan. There is equal potential in all humans, young or old, to comprehend it. Jeevan is the basis of equality among humans. The bodies of any two humans are never the same, but jeevan exists in the same form in all humans. The strengths and powers of jeevan are the same, and the goal of every jeevan is the same.

Jeevan wants to become awakened, and awakening is its goal. Every human seeks resolution and justice. All of us can verify this fact. There is no part of the body that is awaiting or desiring justice, nor is there any part that seeks resolution. Similarly, no part of the body desires prosperity, even though every human naturally yearns for justice, resolution, and prosperity. Therefore, the conclusion is that justice, resolution, prosperity, and truth are the desires of jeevan because humans are a combination of jeevan and body. It is imperative to understand jeevan and its activities, and to comprehend justice, dharma, and truth for jeevan's satisfaction. This, in a nutshell, is the task ahead. The Jeevan Vidya Plan has been presented based on this understanding, which turned into a program. The stalwarts of science and those who don't know any science, the learned ones, and the ordinary people - have all heard this proposal. Some have understood it and are making efforts for others to understand it, and have become successful. It was then that I became confident that what I have understood is relevant and authentic, that everyone can understand it, and upon understanding they can make others understand.

The second plan is Humanisation of Education (shiksha ka manviyakaran). To become wise is everyone's inherent need. Therefore, let us incorporate the entire content of the understanding into education. We made a curriculum to that end and experimented with it in a school. This school was at Govindpur in Bijnaur district, and it was a very good experience there. There is a long-standing belief of educationists that the environment affects the students, but in Govindpur, we experienced that the students affect their environment. We aspire to see this success on a large scale, and are making efforts towards this.

The third plan is Family based Self-Governing System (parivar moolak svarajya vyavastha). It is to bring about a resolution centric system in place of the power-centric rule.

This understanding has thus been articulated in the form of the holistic view, the ideology, the treatises and the plans.

May there be universal well-being!

Jeevan Vidya

I have understood jeevan, and from here begins the effort to impart this understanding to you. This process is called "Jeevan Vidya." I want to first clarify that jeevan is eternally the same. Everyone wants to know and believe the reality of jeevan, and to evidence this understanding. This is the basic objective. Jeevan is neither physical nor non-physical. It is a constitutionally complete atom and a sentient entity. What is constitutional completeness? This atom's constitution doesn't undergo the expulsion or insertion of particles. However, insertion and expulsion are found in the atoms in physicochemical forms, which are called 'results' - whereby the number of constituent particles in such atoms gets altered. This is the only elemental transformation possible in the world. Whenever humans are able to bring about any elemental transformation in nature, it will be limited to altering the number of particles in the evolving-constitution atoms. Such atoms are of two kinds – hungry atoms and overfull atoms. The atoms that remain in hunger (need) of some particles to become satiated, even as each result is a state of being that exhibits wholeness, have been called "hungry atoms." The atoms wherein some particles want to exit have been called "overfull atoms." In this way, the activity of both kinds of atoms is only towards satiety.

The satiated atom is a constitutionally complete atom. This itself is the sentient unit (or jeevan). It has been called the sentient unit because it harbours the capacity to manifest conscience and sensitivity within the human tradition. Without jeevan, even if humans were to succeed in artificially constructing the body, they would be unable to evidence sensitivity, let alone conscience. Therefore, humans can live in harmony and contribute to the universal orderliness of existence only in the course of evidencing their sensitivity and conscience. That is all the work there is! All living beings of animal order evidence sensitivity. Humans, however, don't become satisfied or happy without evidencing conscience, regardless of how hard they may try.

Humans inherently seek happiness. In our pursuit of happiness, we sometimes believe that we will find it through comfort and accumulation, and at other times through prayer and penance, or devotion and detachment. All humans make efforts to achieve happiness, yet there is no evidence that these efforts have led anyone to lasting satisfaction and continuous happiness. In my own pursuit of happiness, I have found it through understanding; similarly, I believe that every person can achieve happiness through understanding. In truth, all humans are united in the right and divided in the wrong. Therefore, it was necessary to identify the entity that is equally present in every human and can be the bearer and carrier of understanding. I realised that entity is 'jeevan' living with resolution.

When 'jeevan' lives with understanding, it presents resolution everywhere. Every person is happy with resolution and unhappy with problems. The entity that understands is jeevan, which drives the human body. Whatever we have taught animals is within the realm of sensitivity. But how does one human make another understand? No one has ever been able to force understanding upon another. A person may remain restrained by the fear of livelihood for some time, but eventually, they shed that fear. The end of slavery in history exemplifies this. Sensitivity involves fear and temptation, and all nations, religions, industrial, and commercial establishments claim to provide order based on fear and temptation. However, neither fear nor temptation can be the basis of orderliness, as they are unacceptable to humans. So, what should humans have? Values and evaluation. There must be a method to recognise values and a technique for evaluation. With these two things, the tradition of continuous resolution will persist. Values and evaluation are processes of understanding; they are not bodily or mechanical processes. Currently, science asserts that everything is mechanical and that feelings are insignificant. This mechanistic worldview forces humans to struggle with fear and temptation, bringing us to a point where the very sustainability of the Earth is in question.

A problem will not be resolved by introducing another problem or by accumulating numerous problems. The eradication of problems can only occur through resolution. There is no relief for us without resolution.

In order to attain resolution, humans must develop a process to establish orderliness through values and evaluation, rooted in developed consciousness (humane consciousness). Success lies in establishing orderliness with jeevan, its relationships, its satisfaction, and its goals at the centre. If we neglect jeevan and construct systems solely for the welfare of the body, it will only lead to disorder. What 'feels' right for the body is not always correct. The body, as an entity, is not eternal; it undergoes change repeatedly, whereas jeevan has eternal continuity. Therefore, we need to have the wisdom to make decisions based on jeevan. Jeevan is in the same form in all humans. Its powers and strengths are inexhaustible because the jeevan atom remains unchanged in its constitution. The strength and power of an entity manifest in its state and motion, respectively. Every human acknowledges the continuity of their being, which is due to presence of jeevan within them. Being itself is presence; the study of reality occurs only in the present. Similarly, jeevan exists in all humans in the same form, with identical strengths and powers. Furthermore, since the goal of jeevan is happiness, all humans aspire for happiness. These four facts must be kept in mind.

Jeevan is a constitutionally complete atom, a sentient unit. The question arises: who creates it? The long-standing belief that everything must have a creator and a destroyer persists, influencing human thought as well. Humans, like this belief, think they can create and destroy, which is a fundamental principle of science. However, this mindset has led to significant frustrations. Some nations claim they can create atom bombs, while others cannot, making equality meaningless. True equality lies in the natural state of existence, whereas the creation of bombs disrupts coexistence. Existence naturally implies coexistence, and any deviation from this natural order inevitably encounters resistance. Commerce, similarly, has become profit-driven, perpetually pursuing 'more.' One person thinks they have 'less,' another 'more,' leading to constant conflict. Such an approach does not foster a healthy and happy human existence. Therefore, for humans to live healthily and happily, they must adopt values and evaluation guided by awakened consciousness. The first step is understanding, the second step is honesty, the third step is responsibility, and the fourth step is participation.

Humans need to evidence their understanding through these four steps. This understanding is categorised into three areas: knowledge of jeevan, knowledge of the holistic view of coexistence, and knowledge of humane conduct. I have already explained jeevan to you. Jeevan is eternal, it aspires for happiness, and it can evidence happiness only within the human tradition. The first step in this process is to understand jeevan, which is termed "Jeevan Vidya". Jeevan is the bearer and the carrier of vidya. There are three parts in the manifestation of vidya: vidya (knowledge), vidvata (learning), and vidvan (the learned). Vidya (Knowledge): The entire coexistence is the source of knowledge. Knowledge is inherently present within coexistence. Jeevan is inseparable from coexistence. Vidvata (Learning): This is the state of understanding, where jeevan accepts coexistence. Vidvan (The Learned): A human who has become learned. Every human is a combined form of jeevan and body.

What is the content of understanding? The entire existence in the form of coexistence is the object of knowing, believing, and living. Jeevan is the entity that is the carrier and bearer of learning, and the human is the one who evidences it. A human being is a combined form of jeevan and body. In this way, the significance of humans, jeevan, and coexistence becomes clear. Existence is naturally in the form of coexistence. Coexistence naturally leads to development. Development is inherent to jeevan. Jeevan naturally tends to awakening. For this, coexistence itself is the phenomenon, and jeevan is the perceiver. The composition and decomposition activities in the physicochemical world are mutually interdependent and eternally present. There is no moment, day, or century when physicochemical activities are absent. Jeevan is the perceiver of all these composition and decomposition activities. It is jeevan that perceives and understands; the body does not understand anything.

The part of the body devoid of the vitality of jeevan is termed as numb. Sensations of cold or heat are not felt in such areas. For instance, during surgery under anaesthesia, there is no perception of pain from incisions or sutures. Thus, sensory perception occurs only in those regions where jeevan maintains vitality. When jeevan seeks its own fulfilment, it embarks on a quest for truth, meaning, and reality. Therefore, jeevan is the basis of happiness. This is the reason we need to understand jeevan. Everyone has this need—the rich, the poor, the mighty, the weak, the old, and the young.

We discover another formula here: Jeevan Vidya refutes the existential basis of class struggle. Instead, it recognises coexistence as the foundation for universal well-being, the source of continuous happiness for all, and evidence of resolution in life. These realisations naturally arise upon understanding. In my view, humans want this very knowledge, and they want to live according to this only. We can live happily only in the togetherness of all. “Nothing is isolated” – that is the principle. Attempting to find happiness by severing our relationship with the Earth is destined to fail. One cannot find happiness by forsaking their relationship with water. If we cannot become happy by leaving the relationship with material things, then how will we become happy by leaving the relationship with jeevan? How can we become so mechanistic? How can we be without feelings? Reflect on how unsustainable such a life would be. When we go to the market, we inquire about the value of every item – vegetables, grains, gold, and so on. Who determines this value? Only humans can. Since everything possesses value, humans themselves should be valued. There was a crucial need to understand the value of humans, yet we allocated value to everything else instead. We clung to the value of those things where profit could be made, while neglecting the value of humanity. By comprehending human values, jeevan values, established values, and civic values, concerns about profit and loss vanish. We would then live based on the usefulness value, which will alleviate such a huge burden from the Earth. Profit and loss constitute a relentless cycle that not only fails to secure humans but also destroys everything in its path. Humans can break free from this cycle only when they comprehend values. It is not going to happen before that. This liberation cannot occur before this understanding dawns. Despite our efforts, we have hit a wall, as evidenced by communism and capitalism. Communism failed to break free from the pursuit of profit and ended up striving for national profit, while capitalism unabashedly prioritises profit. Therefore, humans must grasp their values to emancipate themselves from profit and loss. Fulfilling human values is imperative. How can this be achieved? Human values are realised through understanding Jeevan Vidya – i.e. comprehending existence in the form of coexistence and embracing humane conduct with confidence. This, in itself, constitutes understanding.

Only when we begin to embody human values do we become capable, and consequently proficient, in doing what is 'right'. Until then, we remain ensnared by various obsessions, unable to discern the path towards righteousness. Humans need to understand jeevan and humane conduct in coexistence in order to become wise. This itself is Jeevan Vidya. Vidya has two parts – knowledge of jeevan, and the knowledge of holistic view of coexistence. Jeevan is the carrier and bearer of these both. The knowledge of jeevan means the process of a jeevan understanding jeevan. The process of understanding existence by a jeevan is called knowledge of the holistic view of coexistence. All jeevans are identical, and therefore, the jeevans within all humans are inherently alike. What defines this sameness? It becomes evident that all jeevans share the same capacity for understanding jeevan, evidencing knowledge, comprehending existence, and evidencing coexistence.

The capacity for understanding does not reside in any part of the body—whether hands, legs, ears, nose, eyes, brain, or heart. This capacity solely exists within jeevan. Jeevan alone possesses the ability to comprehend itself and coexistence; nothing else possesses this capability. Thus, we deduce that the combined form of jeevan and body is necessary for manifesting (evidencing) the understanding. It would neither occur solely by the body nor solely by jeevan. Evidence of understanding is exemplified through humans living in orderliness and their participation in universal orderliness, which is the embodiment of understanding itself. All of us want to live in orderliness, and this naturally stems from jeevan; it is not an external imposition upon us.

In the course of understanding coexistence, it becomes clear that existence itself is coexistence, because nature, saturated (immersed, soaked, and surrounded) in Omnipotence (Omnipresence), constitutes the entire existence. Nature is in the form of entities that can be counted. Humans are the ones who count. The countable entities include all sentient and insentient nature.

There exists a simple formula: humans are happy with understanding and unhappy as long as they dwell in ignorance or animal consciousness. Throughout history, humanity has grappled with various challenges. Initially, the struggle was against the forces of nature and wild animals. Subsequently, people sought happiness through practices such as penance, yoga, or asceticism, yet these endeavours failed to yield any evidence of sustained happiness, and the tradition of happiness could not be established. Another belief arose that amassing material wealth and seeking comfort would bring happiness, only to be disillusioned by its inefficacy. It became evident upon reflection that understanding leads to resolution, and resolution begets happiness. This understanding manifests as righteous work and behaviour.

Humans are united in the right, and divided in the wrong. It is not possible for you to agree or concur with my wrong, nor is it possible for me to agree or concur with your wrong. That which is wrong is as wrong for you as it is for me. We are united in the right, this I have understood.

Our well-being becomes assured only in, from, and for the understanding. It is only through understanding that we become happy and prosperous. With understanding, we live orderly in the present, and it is through understanding that we establish coexistence as a tradition. There are four stages of happiness: living with resolution, prosperity, fearlessness, and coexistence. We become happy when these four aspects are evident in our lives. Until we achieve these four, we keep striving to establish the tradition of understanding. In this pursuit, humans have engaged in various practices such as chanting, penance, prayer, recitation of scriptures, yoga, and yajna. We have amassed many material things, but this hasn't resulted in happiness for all. For universal happiness, humans must become wise. Understanding can be instilled in everyone. The first step is understanding existence, which consists of four orders.

Material Order: This includes soils, stones, gems, metals, etc., all of which exhibit definite conduct. Biological order: This encompasses all trees, plants, vegetation, medicinal herbs, etc., which also demonstrate their respective definite conducts. Animal Order: This includes all animals and birds, excluding humans, and these too show inherent orderliness. Knowledge Order: This comprises only humans, who are yet to achieve orderliness. Consider this: the most developed order (knowledge order) is lagging behind all others. What does this imply? It implies that humans are suffering because they have not yet attained the developed form of consciousness. Therefore, our consciousness needs to develop to reflect our evolved status.

Each entity in existence evidences orderliness in the form of its conduct. Humans will also evidence orderliness through their conduct. This is the principle that all of us need to verify. As we go about this verification, we must first understand the entity within us that actually understands. Then, we must understand the entity that lives based on that understanding. Finally, we must understand what we will accomplish by this understanding. This is the extent of human potential. Humans are counted in the knowledge order. What is the basis for considering humans in the knowledge order? Even within the realm of animal consciousness, humans work and behave according to what they believe they've understood.

Everyone has the capacity of believing. Even when one is living in animal consciousness, they don't truly know but only believe, yet they still make claims of knowing. This is a contradiction because it is not possible to verify universal well-being while living in animal consciousness. This contradiction is present in deluded humans. Ninety-nine percent of people consider themselves to be merely bodies, and this delusion has led to various difficulties. As a result, humanity has been plagued by these difficulties and now aspires to liberate itself from them. This program aims to address that aspiration.

Only humans among the four orders of nature cannot attain happiness without understanding and resolution. The material order is regulated by structural conformity, while the biological order is regulated by seed conformity. The animal order is regulated by species conformity. The evidence of regulation manifests as orderliness and definite conduct. Every unit of nature, except humans, exhibits definite conduct. Humans also require definite conduct, which they achieve through sanskar-conformity. Sanskar, manifested as developed consciousness, is the basis of understanding. Humane conduct is the evidence of this understanding. When humans become wise, they live in orderliness, and their conduct is humane. However, when they fail to live in orderliness, their conduct is deemed inhumane. This distinction gives us the definition of humane and inhumane conduct. Subsequently, we realise whether we need it or not. Humans have a natural tendency towards what they need. This is the path for humans to become awakened.

Jeevan is neither born nor does it die; it is the body that gets formed and deformed. Jeevan wants to drive the human body according to its own natural way – which is the understanding and program of being happy. All animals only exhibit the hope of living by the way of species-conformity. However, humans aspire to live happily, and they encounter difficulties when they attempt to live according to species-conformity. That is the essence of it. This needs to be properly understood and evidenced. Understanding itself is to be evidenced. When, having grasped the understanding from you, I am able to convey it to others, only then does your understanding become evident. This is how understanding flows in tradition. Ignorance cannot flow in tradition. The object of understanding doesn't vary. Any variation occurs in its expression; thus, with each successive generation, it becomes more robust and refined. The path of righteousness keeps becoming ever sharper and more accessible. This is necessary for all humans. Hence, only a human possessing understanding can correctly impart their wisdom to the succeeding generation, thus finding satisfaction for themselves and for the future generation

Humans are sanskar-conforming units. Sanskar is the combined form of understanding, honesty, responsibility, and participation. Since wrongs are not acceptable to anyone, they do not become sanskar. No one accepts wrongs but remains ensnared by them. Even if a person has committed a thousand wrongs, those wrongs remain unacceptable to them. Because wrongs are not acceptable to anyone, no one passes them on to the next generation. Thus, the tradition of senselessness (wrongs) does not form. These examples lead to the conclusion that understanding is the foundation of tradition. The focal point for understanding is the identity of humane consciousness among humans. The focus of identity is jeevan. Constitutional completeness and inexhaustible strengths and powers are the identities in every jeevan. Regardless of the extent of hope, thought, or desire, my capacity for them remains intact. The inexhaustible strengths and powers in jeevan couldn't exist if its constitution were subject to change. This is the logical reasoning for accepting the constitutional completeness of jeevan.

The understanding that has been accepted in me is verified through my behaviour, work, and participation in systems. I have repeatedly verified it in my behaviour and work, and found that my living is orderly in the form of resolution and prosperity. However, universal orderliness is yet to be established in human tradition. My living in the form of an indivisible society itself serves as evidence in human tradition of my having understood reality as it is in existence, which further enhances realisation. This realisation keeps strengthening over time. This paves the way for realisation-based living. In conclusion, upon attaining understanding, humans live in orderliness through a realisation-based approach. The orderliness of the animal order is through species-conformance, the biological order is through seed-conformance, and the material order is through constitution-conformance.

We can conclude that understanding is definite and it pertains to living with developed consciousness. The bearer and carrier of understanding is definite; therefore, the evidence of understanding is also definite. Jeevan itself becomes wise. Jeevan is the entity that understands, and the evidence of understanding occurs only within human tradition because the fully developed brain is found only in the human body. The evidence of understanding will not be found in any other (animal) species. Coexistence encompasses complementariness, evolution, development progression, development and awakening. The method for understanding all these points is inherent only in humans. The potential for this understanding is also inherent only in humans.

The fundamental issue in understanding existence is that existence is nature saturated in Omnipotence. Nature and Omnipotence are found to be thoroughly intertwined with one another, eternally inseparable, continuously extant and present. There is no method to separate nature from Omnipresence, nor is there any purpose in such separation, as they cannot be separated. Thus, imagining something that does not exist within existence yields no tangible results. The task at hand is to comprehend and validate what exists. Existence manifests itself across the four orders.

If we fail to evidence understanding, we will neither be able to live in the orderliness of family nor in the orderliness of society, and will end up suffering everywhere. The human population on Earth has surpassed seven billion, yet our orderly way of living has not yet materialised. Whether the population grows or diminishes, it has nothing to do with the attainment of understanding. What is the purpose of human tradition? It is to evidence resolution, prosperity, fearlessness, and coexistence. Coexistence means living with complementarity. Fearlessness is trust in the present. Prosperity is producing in excess of our family's needs. Resolution is living with justice.

Human endeavours through idealism and materialism could not achieve the understanding. The root cause of this is our failure to understand existence in the form of coexistence. We erred in understanding jeevan and its awakening within coexistence, as a result the tradition of understanding could not be established. Without such a tradition, how could humans learn to live in orderliness? In the absence of understanding, we have not managed to live judiciously with fellow humans and lawfully with the rest of nature (animal, biological, and material order) in a balanced way. This is why humans have continued to destroy their natural surroundings.

Humans have not been able to find justice anywhere. When the chief justices of high courts were questioned about it, they responded, 'We do not administer justice; we merely render judgments.' If the judicial courts themselves are unaware of justice, can they truly be called halls of justice? Especially when these very courts instruct you to speak the truth. What truth can be expected from such courts?"

Similarly, what tasks does the administration perform besides searching for errors and crimes, and then attempting to prevent them by committing more errors and crimes? All personnel in the government machinery are deployed to these tasks alone. The essential element for human awakening is understanding. If understanding reaches every human being, then humanity shall be able to live justly. With justice comes prosperity, fearlessness, and coexistence naturally. Without living justly, resolution cannot be achieved. Therefore, justice is the backbone of humaneness. Justice is first evidenced in a wise family, then in society, and finally across the whole Earth as universal orderliness. Living justly ensures that humans remain satisfied, happy, and resolved. Their trust in the present becomes firmer, and their behaviour continuously refines. All of these are accomplished spontaneously by living with justice. It is said that one achieves these through the accumulation of virtue, which I now understand to mean wisdom. In the tradition of wisdom, humans spontaneously manifest their potential, ability, and receptivity. Potential means the activity of carrying, whether it be delusion or awakening. Delusion dissipates naturally upon awakening. Humans are sanskar-conformance units. Tradition is the source of understanding or delusion. The traits of tradition are instilled in a human child from birth. Thereafter through their diligence and quest, they become liberated from delusion upon attaining wisdom. Liberation from delusion signifies living in alignment with jeevan's awakening. The education we have received from tradition so far is primarily focused on living in alignment with the body, akin to animals. This emphasis is evident in the obsession for profit, sex, and consumption fostered by such education. However, human nature is fundamentally distinct from that of animals. Humans are multidimensional expressions, seeking resolution and prosperity in ways unparalleled by any animal, plant, or stone. While animals instinctively collect what they find without hoarding, humans exhibit a wilful tendency towards comfort and accumulation, driven by a lust for over-consumption. Consequently, comfort and accumulation have supplanted resolution and orderliness as the primary goals of our lives. Our perspective has become confined to pleasure, health, and profit, resulting in ongoing suffering, struggle, and oppression. The only way out of this difficulty is to understand jeevan's awakening, coexistence and humane conduct.

Humans are the most developed entities in existence, both as jeevan and in bodily form. Jeevan uses the body to manifest its existence and awakening. While keeping the body alive, jeevan falls into the delusion that the body itself is jeevan by living in animal consciousness. However, this cycle eventually restarts with jeevan incarnating into a new body, driven by the imperative to manifest itself. This perpetual cycle of birth and death is a matter of distress. It is not a matter of virtue or sin but rather one of understanding or ignorance. Since understanding is inherited from tradition, it must be integral to tradition itself. The emancipation of the whole world does not depend solely on one person becoming wise; such notions only engender fear and helplessness. In the realm of humane conduct, every individual can live with rightfully owned wealth, marital faithfulness, and kindness in work and behaviour. Right-use and protection of body, mind and wealth are ensured by such living. When these elements are harmonised, justice - manifested through relationships, values, evaluation, and mutual satisfaction - becomes self-evident.

In this way, humane conduct is explained as the combined form of values, character, and ethics. The right-use and protection of resources in the form of body, mind, and wealth constitute ethics. Values are realised through the recognition of relationships. For example, when someone recognises their relationship with their father, mother, or guru in terms of orderliness, values naturally flow, resulting in the fulfilment of those values. Where relationships are not recognised, there is no flow of values.

Consider a scenario where someone is sitting alone in a train compartment, and a stranger enters. The individual who was seated initially instinctively stretches out their hands and legs, reluctant to share the space. However, if a familiar person enters, they may even offer their seat willingly. Hence, the recognition of relationships is paramount. The study of relationships is guided by their respective purposes; nurturing defines the mother-child relationship, while protection characterises the father-child relationship. Once all the relationships are recognised, humans no longer make mistakes in these contexts. Conversely, in the absence of such recognition, mistakes are inevitable.

It is evident from observing the propaganda of the prevailing systems of the State and Religion that these have been designed for criminals. Both of these systems are engaged in the redemption of criminals in their own way. However, neither of these systems has been able to impart understanding to humans. Every human being desires to become wise and honest, yet these systems have not been able to show the path of honesty. Similarly, every human aspires to become responsible, but these systems have failed to instil the purpose of responsibility in tradition. People have expressed desires for universal wellbeing, family happiness, and similar aspirations. We have all echoed such slogans. However, mere utterance or repetition does not lead to finding the path.

The same book that speaks of universal wellbeing also declares the world to be an illusion and advocates seeking refuge in God as the real father and mother. Yet, no tangible good comes from it. After seeking refuge in the 'real mother and father,' no human is found. So, whose good will occur and where? These narratives serve no real purpose. It is through wisdom that the purpose of humanity becomes clear. Purpose is inherent in all relationships. But what is this purpose? It is solely about achieving resolution, prosperity, fearlessness, and coexistence. The purpose of all relationships is intricately linked to these goals, thus forming a tradition aligned with them. This tradition can only be one of understanding; ignorance cannot sustain an unbroken tradition. Consequently, no tradition aimed at universal wellbeing has been established thus far.

Those produced by the current education system consider themselves the epitome of intelligence, while viewing the rest of the world as stupid. Millions of such graduates emerge annually. How do we impart understanding to each one of them? Where will we find enough doctors to fix them?

No one accepts anything until they have understood it themselves. I am a testament to this truth. I was surrounded by ved-murtis in my family, neighbourhood, and village, yet they could not make me read the Vedas because I did not want to read. However, every individual on Earth desires to become wise. On this basis, there is a complete possibility that every human can become wise. It is on this premise that I initiated this movement. It began with a sincere ambition to impart understanding to every human being. Through this movement, those who have gained understanding have found solace, and qualities we deem humane have blossomed within them.

The essence of ethics is deploying resources in the form of body, mind and wealth towards purpose. It is called the right-use. Right-use happens in two ways: - 1. Deploying body, mind and wealth towards production and seva, 2. Devoting body, mind and wealth with relationships towards realisation of their purpose. When resources are rightly used, they become secure, and whatever purpose they are used for also becomes secure. This is what we mean by right-use and security. When we allocate our resources—body, mind, and wealth—towards resolution, prosperity, and orderliness, with trust in the present and fostering coexistence, they become secure.

This results in the right-use of our wealth. There won't be security without right-use, and there can't be right-use without security. Right-use and security of resources lead to eternal wellbeing. The inherent need to deploy our body, mind, and wealth towards righteousness is meant for our awakening.

Human beings are the only entities in existence capable of wisdom. Humans are a combination of jeevan and body. Human bodies follow the lineage tradition, while jeevan exists naturally in existence as a constitutionally complete entity, with no human contribution to its creation. The human body, however, is a product of human tradition. This is how it is provisioned in existence. The union of jeevan and body is necessary for jeevan to manifest its awakening. Human bodies have the provision to evidence understanding, a feature not present in animal bodies. Therefore, humans are recognised as sanskar-conformance entities. Apart from humans, all three orders in nature are mutually complementary. Now, it is imperative for humans to embrace complementariness. For humans to live in harmony, complementariness is essential; this cannot be achieved through individualism or hedonism. The two ideologies of materialism and asceticism in the past led humans towards individualism. Materialism leads humans towards hedonism, resulting in individualism. Asceticism, on the other hand, is inherently individualistic. Both of these ideologies failed to provide a blueprint for societal formation and instead proved to be detrimental to society. However, humans yearn to live in society. They desire to live in coexistence, prosperity, and resolution. It is the responsibility of humankind to achieve these three objectives: coexistence, prosperity, and resolution.

Understanding naturally leads to responsibility, and taking up responsibility makes us participants in family and society. This leads to our evidencing the universality of being human. There is a need to establish such a magnificent tradition of humankind. Every human being hopes for orderliness, aspires for orderliness, and, according to me, even desires orderliness. However, this desire often takes a backseat to other priorities. As a result, the desire for orderliness remains weak, and humans find themselves unable to fully commit to it. They become helpless due to living in animal consciousness.

Therefore, what is the solution? We should focus on educating those who are ready to understand immediately. Through them, we should practice humane education in educational institutions and instill sanskar in children. As sanskar is instilled in children, their homes and families will naturally undergo a transformation. Thus, there is a need for the humanisation of education. Making education meaningful will pave the way for an orderly society, which is our second plan.

The units of material order, biological order, and animal order are complementary to humans. However, humans becoming complementary to them is still under consideration. This gap must be filled. Only then will we get the evidence of human living in orderliness.

The values of awakened jeevan are: happiness, peace, contentment, and bliss. Human goals are accomplished by realising jeevan values. These goals are resolution, prosperity, fearlessness, and coexistence. When human goals are evidenced, jeevan values are also evidenced.

Resolution = Happiness. We realise happiness wherever we are resolved, and we suffer wherever we are unresolved. Thereafter, we realise peace while evidencing resolution and prosperity in the family. We realise contentment by living orderly in society. We realise bliss in the course of evidencing our understanding.

As we achieve these goals, understanding becomes ingrained in human tradition, enabling us to realise happiness, peace, contentment, and bliss, respectively.

Jeevan possesses inexhaustible strengths and powers. Therefore, once resolution is attained, we can continuously manifest and evidence it, while the fulfilment of jeevan remains intact. Jeevan's state activities are in the form of strengths, and its motion activities are in the form of powers. The motion activities of jeevan are evidenced in their mutuality with one another. The state activities of jeevan are realised within oneself. We realise whether or not we became satisfied with all that we tasted and whether or not we reached a definite conclusion from all the deliberation we did.

Further, I attained realisation after revelation (sakshatkar) and definitive understanding (avdharna bodh) of truth, thereupon contemplated (chintan) through this enlightenment (bodh). I keep examining the purpose of my actions based on this essential understanding. We will have to do this examining, there is no other way. Satisfaction of jeevan at these five levels paves the way for continuous happiness. This itself has been termed as happiness, peace, contentment and bliss. The evidence in these five levels in jeevan gets established as the grandeur of self-governance in human living. The self-governance is the grandeur of humans upon attaining humaneness, or orderly living. Self-governance is the self-inspired orderly living, which is the manifestation of humane conduct. The grandeur of human awakening is in realising their relationships at the level of individual, family, society, nature, and universal orderliness. We come to trust in the present only through the process of realising values in our relationships. Without recognising our relationships, we cease to inhabit the present, instead retreating into a past devoid of presence. Yet, we cannot dwell in the past. Thus, we cast our thoughts towards the future, which similarly lacks presence. Consequently, humans find themselves adrift, lacking a tether to life's purpose, and thus wander aimlessly. No one desires such aimlessness, yet tradition fails to provide direction and purpose. The evidence of tradition will emerge only when every individual can attain enlightenment through consciousness development value education. The understanding can manifest as humaneness in every human's conduct. The grandeur and magnificence of humans is in making understanding prevail. It is with this grandeur that humans can achieve a tradition of continuous happiness. They can achieve harmony in their interaction with the animal world, plant world and mineral world, making their use and right-use while being grateful for their complementariness, thereby living purposefully.

The harmony with humans is as a relationship, values, evaluation and mutual satisfaction. We choose satisfaction over dissatisfaction. Every human, in the anticipation of satisfaction, evidences coexistence through resolution, prosperity, trust in the present, and living in orderliness. Existence is the ultimate truth, since this itself has eternal continuity in the form of coexistence. Coexistence is continuously in effect, as a result there is emergence of development and awakening. The development progression is as continuous activity of physicochemical reality. How many jeevan atoms are to be is determined by the way of coexistence, it is not the doing of deluded humans.

Existence has manifested all the four orders naturally, which has no human contribution. Humans could not evidence complementariness with the rest of nature, instead they have only been exploiting it. It begs the question: how can humanity hope to find happiness through exploitation? This is a matter worth pondering. Across nations, sects, religions, and even within families, the prevailing belief is that happiness can be attained through exploitation. Both the state and society uphold this belief, considering exploitation as the only means to human happiness. This mindset persists to this day. Even science aligns with this notion, asserting that human survival hinges on struggle and exploitation. Survival here refers to survival of one's own kins. Struggle implies - might is right. The prevailing belief suggests that development is synonymous with struggle. A nation's development is often measured by its capacity to wage wars, engage in commerce, and exploit resources. However, the truth is that development is attained only by a nation that has become awakened - one that embodies orderliness, resolution, prosperity, confidence, and understanding of coexistence.

There is a difference in the way jeevan understands jeevan, and the way jeevan understands existence. As far as material things are concerned, we recognise them upon experimentation based on their usefulness. We recognise usefulness in the form of common and special aspirations. The common aspirations are food, shelter and clothing. The special aspirations are telecommunication and transportation. Most of these have been discovered and are being produced. There have been efforts to make these commonly accessible commercially. Commercial methods, however, are always with anticipation of profit.

The identification of our common and special aspirations is derived from the jeevan's analysis activity. Once these are identified, we engage in their production, leading to the realisation of prosperity. As prosperity dawns, we begin to live in a state of orderliness. Hence, it is imperative to cultivate self-reliance in our students, and thereafter develop their tendency for evidence in the family and living in universal orderliness. It is good fortune of humans to evidence at these three levels. Its inherent need in humans is the one and only basis to actualise this good fortune. When this need gets identified then it would be natural for humans to evidence themselves after diligently studying this proposal.

So far, we have tried to understand - what is understanding? Who understands? What is the content of understanding? The entity that understands is 'jeevan'. The content of understanding is 'existence', 'jeevan', and 'humane conduct' only. In the journey of comprehending existence, we need to understand development, as well as the physicochemical composition and decomposition processes. These processes are inherent in existence, manifesting as material order and biological order. These undergo continuous transformation from one state to another. For instance, trees and plants naturally wither over time, transforming into soil—a phenomenon known as transformability, which characterises the perpetual flux of the physicochemical realm. Similarly, the formation and eventual demise of animal and human bodies follow a cyclical pattern. Bodies are conceived and take shape in the womb, only to return to the elements upon death, contributing to the cycle of soil, air, and water.

The entity which understands, jeevan, remains the same forever. In humans, jeevan is the only entity that understands. Existence has been understood in the form of coexistence only. It is only with the co-existential outlook that we become capable of living in orderliness in every situation. Living in orderliness is the goal of humans, living in orderliness itself is happiness. Jeevan suffers from problems while living in disorder. Consequently, the search for resolution becomes inevitable. Jeevan has an inherent tendency to continuously search and explore. It is not just in jeevan, exploration goes on even in the insentient atoms. This is the cause of transformation in the insentient nature. Everywhere, there exists a natural inclination towards coexistence. This inclination is what leads atomic particles to assemble into atoms, atoms to combine into molecules, and molecules to combine into molecular forms. In this way, humans can understand the being of infinite planets and celestial bodies in existence. The basic form of diversity in the insentient nature lies in the differentiation of particles comprising atoms. These distinct atomic structures, each with its defined status in nature, give rise to diversity in their arrangements. For instance, the biological order exhibits a multitude of compositions. These compositions, inherent to the entities, naturally exist in their respective forms, participating in coexistence. The substances taking these forms are also embodiments of coexistence. Thus, the entirety of existence, with its manifestations, is grounded in this principle. Humans, too, are a part of existence.

Humans are inseparable from coexistence; they cannot detach themselves from it. The more they try to escape, the deeper their turmoil grows. Every individual yearns for resolution, driving them on an endless quest. Each person holds the right to pursue harmony within the framework of existence. As every human being lives by seeking, the meaning of free will becomes clear. Life's purpose converges on a singular goal: happiness. Humans seek to live with happiness. There is only one path to happiness i.e. achieving jeevan's and human's objective. Jeevan's objective is accomplished with understanding. Jeevan becomes satisfied with understanding, and a satisfied jeevan alone is capable of sustaining the evidence of the human objectives of resolution, prosperity, fearlessness and coexistence. This itself is the evidence of living in orderliness. As one lives in orderliness, these four goals are achieved. Such a human tradition is beneficent for one another. Imparting understanding to another itself is benevolence, whereby the meaning of coexistence gets actualised in the form of tradition. In human tradition, orderliness entails maintaining coexistence in the present. Anything that disrupts coexistence also disturbs orderliness. Due to their imaginativeness and free will, deluded humans can cause any kind of disturbance. For instance, significant damage has been inflicted upon the Earth. They didn't know what difficulties could arise from this disturbance, and when they came to know, there was no available remedy. Humans keep searching and exploring owing to their imaginativeness and free will, but this search and exploration is meaningful only when it is for orderliness, and for achieving resolution, prosperity, fearlessness, and coexistence. Understanding leads humans to achieve:

1. Self-confidence
2. Respect for Excellence
3. Balance in Talent and Personality
4. Sociability in Behaviour
5. Self-reliance in Vocation

These can be called merits. Humans become social with these merits. Evidencing understanding in living itself is ‘learning’. Only humans could become ‘learned’ among all the existence. While there is a continuous search in every unit of nature, the learning is possible only in humans.

We have described four activities in humans here – knowing, believing, recognising, and fulfilling. Among these, recognising and fulfilling are inherent in every entity of nature. Every entity of nature recognises another; that is why it fulfils. An atomic particle too recognises another, and as a result, these particles abide in orderliness. They cohabit and function with one another, thus manifesting coexistence. Similarly, starting from molecules to planets, the entities of nature recognise one another and fulfil accordingly. All units of material order, biological order, and animal order also recognise one another and fulfil, which is evident in the form of complementariness in nature.

Humans, however, could not be satisfied with mere recognising and fulfilling, and doubts arose within them. Humans have two additional activities – knowing and believing. Humans become satisfied with recognising and fulfilling only on the basis of knowing and believing. Knowing and believing are only of meaning and purpose. Humans can become social only in the course of knowing and believing. In the absence of knowing and believing, one cannot become social nor can they evidence coexistence.

The activities of jeevan could basically be seen in five parts. Each part has two activities in the form of state and motion respectively. For example, every jeevan has hope (asha) wherein there are two activities – taste (asvadan) and selection (chayan). What we choose according to our taste is the selection activity. We taste, which is also an activity. The part of jeevan where both these activities happen is called mun. For selection activity, humans have imagined what all is needed for taste. They have accumulated a great deal for this, and are busy in accumulating even more. So far, we have worked for comfort and accumulation. The reason being, the more we lagged in understanding (knowing and believing) the purpose of comfort and accumulation, the more helpless we became for these. We could not find the point of satisfaction of comfort and accumulation anywhere.

However, when we understand the practical purpose of our material accumulation, we learn that food, shelter and clothing are for nourishment and protection of body, while telecommunication and transportation are for social participation. All these things have become available, but humans haven't become satisfied based on comfort and accumulation. This is a huge irony.

Two other activities of jeevan are deliberation (tulan) and analysis (vishleshan). Jeevan performs analysis activity based on its capability. All analyses are ultimately for recognising purposes. The fundamental purpose of humans is to evidence resolution, prosperity, fearlessness and coexistence in living. The opposite path is pursuit of consumption and over-consumption, where humans won't find any stability.

At present, science concludes that all humans will be dead after some time and Earth will get destroyed. That is bound to happen if we go on like this. Thinking from the way Earth has evolved, humans emerged only after the planet had become fully enriched and habitable for them. Gradually the opportunity of awakening became available to humans living in animal consciousness. Instead of becoming awakened, they moved towards consumption and over-consumption. By making consumption and over-consumption their way of life, they entered into an endless pursuit of comfort and accumulation. The Earth does not have enough resources to satisfy everyone's lust for comfort and accumulation. Therefore, sooner or later, this lust will lead to human ruin. All objects of comfort and accumulation need to be aligned with the human purpose – i.e., towards the nourishment-protection of the body and social participation. Moving towards social participation leads to participation in an indivisible society and universal orderliness. As humans live based on these premises, they become capable of living with resolution-prosperity and happiness-peace. In this way, the goal of jeevan is to evidence human awakening in existence. In this way, the goal of jeevan is to evidence human awakening in existence. Its success is based on the fact that every human wants to live in orderliness. While in delusion, the basis of order is fear and temptation. Upon awakening, orderliness is with the recognition of values, evaluation, and mutual satisfaction. There is a need to develop understanding for it.

May there be universal well-being!

The True form of Jeevan

Jeevan is the inseparable form of mun, vritti, chitta, buddhi, and atma, as these never separate from one another. Mun has two functions: selection (chayan) and taste (asvadan). Vritti has two functions: analysis (vishleshan) and deliberation (tulan). Chitta has two functions: visualisation (chitran) and contemplation (chintan). Buddhi has two functions: resolve (sankalp) and enlightenment (bodh). Atma has two functions: authenticity (pramanikta) and realisation (anubhav). Every jeevan continuously operates through these ten activities. Jeevan, with these ten activities, is evidenced in either a state of delusion or awakening. In a deluded state, jeevan is inspired by sensitivity, and only four and a half out of its ten activities are effective due to animal consciousness. The remaining activities lack the substance for understanding, resulting in internal conflict within jeevan. These four and a half activities are selection, taste, analysis, visualisation, and half of deliberation. Taste and selection occur based on sensitivity, where one chooses what is pleasant to the hands, feet, nose, ears, eyes, tongue, etc., and avoids what is unpleasant. Deliberation, based on sensitivity, operates from the perspective of pleasure, health, and profit. In the same vein, analysis and visualisation activities are also performed accordingly. In summary, we become ready to live while being identified with bodily sensations. This is called a “deluded jeevan.” This leads to continuous internal conflict, with constant dilemmas about whether something is right or wrong, more or less. This mentality resembles that of primitive humans, though only material things have increased. Awakening the remaining five and a half activities of jeevan, which happens through understanding, is essential for developing a humane mentality.

The four and a half activities of jeevan are sufficient for recognising and fulfilling the five senses and four instincts, where humans live like an animal or a demon. It is not possible to live humanely with only four and a half activities. Such living doesn't result in satisfaction. The main issue now is to evidence all ten activities of jeevan in behaviour, as "awakening". Manifesting partial activities would not be awakening. For example, a healthy body is when all the five sense organs and the five action organs are functioning properly with mutual coordination. If someone's hands or legs don't work then we will call that person a cripple. We won't call that person healthy.

Awakening cannot happen unless and until we connect our activities of recognising and fulfilling, with our activities of knowing and believing. Until now, humans have evidenced jeevan's four and a half activities through recognising and fulfilling sensory desires. The remaining activities of jeevan are evidenced in behaviour, which is the basis of awakening. This will happen only by way of knowing and believing. Nature, apart from humans, remains regulated in course of recognising and fulfilling wherein it functions according to its laws, this way they are in orderliness.

The maximum that can happen with sensitivity gets achieved in the animal world. Had that been the final destination, there is no need for humans to exist. Nothing is purposeless in existence. Existence as a whole is in the form of a synergistic, harmonious and rhythmic orderliness. Each motion, each state, each order in existence is interwoven meaningfully. This meaningfulness is in the form of conduct in orderliness and participation in universal orderliness. In awakened jeevan - enlightenment and resolve activities are based on realisation and authenticity, and thereafter the contemplation and visualisation activities also start functioning accordingly. The same becomes the basis for deliberation, analysis, taste and selection activities. Currently, in our delusion, we perceive sensitivity as the paramount attribute for thinking and planning about anything. However, awakening is rooted solely in values and evaluation. Our entire lifestyle has been constructed around sensitivity. In this lifestyle, everything necessary for survival is valued except for humans themselves. It encompasses the animal world, plant world, and mineral world. We are all too familiar with how we humans have exploited these resources, relentlessly pursuing our own success at the expense of others, resulting in imbalance. Earth is suffering from our relentless pursuit of comfort and accumulation. Now, there looms a question of whether it's still possible to salvage Earth. Humans will have to stop the crimes they have been committing with Earth and they will have to understand the way of living without crime. The freedom from crime cannot happen from the ideas presented by science so far, which have entered into art and education as well. That path leads to a dead-end, destruction of Earth, and conflict among humans.

Several major nations have united to form the United Nations Organisation (UNO), which has convened numerous conventions. It remains undecided whether the right to militarization should reside with this union, individual nations, or if it should not exist at all. Should wars exist in any form? Similarly, our education system undergoes quarterly reviews. Despite multiple reviews, the ideal education for humans remains undecided.

In my observation, every human child is inherently inclined towards doing what is right and seeks justice. They speak the truth. However, as they grow up, they learn to lie because we have created an environment where living without lying seems impossible. Lies pervade the commercial world. State rule is founded on deception. Even education fails to nurture truth. What recourse is there for humans in such a situation? In this way, the daily routines and behaviour of people get shaped by their circumstances. Humans have not reached any definite goal under these conditions, nor will they ever in the future. It is imperative to come out of this crisis, but that will happen only when humans become wise. When that happens, their way of life will be characterised by humane conduct.

Values and evaluation in humane conduct are founded on the principle of coexistence. Realising values does not require the establishment of laboratories or engagement in warfare. Knowing and believing the purpose of relationships is essential for recognising and fulfilling them towards indivisible society and universal orderliness. Without knowing and believing the purpose, recognising and fulfilling go astray. For instance, we overlooked the purpose of our relationship with the Earth. We failed to understand the purpose of the environment. Consequently, we could not grasp the totality of the Earth and its environment. This lack of understanding led to the catastrophic collapse of our planet. It is imperative to understand unequivocally that if humankind is to survive on this Earth, then this proposal outlines the necessary course correction for humanity.

Due to delusion, humans have lived for sensory gratification rather than with conscious awareness, leaving them unsatisfied. A dissatisfied person does whatever they feel like doing. Our entire task is to transform dissatisfaction into satisfaction, which we call 'awakening'. Satisfaction will come through understanding, which is the eternal source of fulfilment. Jeevan never dies; when it gains understanding and satisfaction, this state continues forever. We have seen all these things. Based on this, the proposal is that understanding is the right of every human. Every individual can research this. In my opinion, humanity can prosper and create its future moments with complete resolution.

Biological cells decompose into the soil and turn into fertiliser. The natural arrangement of food for food is an intrinsic process in nature. Fertilisers are formed naturally this way. Biological cells are created, and the structures made from these cells decompose back into the soil, becoming fertiliser. Human emergence on Earth occurred only after this soil fertility was established. Since humans appeared, they began exploiting forests. With the advent of the scientific age, the exploitation extended to minerals. Excessive exploitation of both minerals and vegetation has depleted the Earth's fertility and the levels of life-giving oxygen.

Now, to the scientists who believe they are benefitting the world by producing chemical fertilisers, I suggest that the natural process of fertiliser formation is the only way to preserve Earth's fertility. Rivers carry and deposit unnecessary materials from the Earth's surface into the oceans, maintaining balance. Dense vegetation and forests on Earth's surface are crucial for this balance. Instead, we humans tend to create additional problems while attempting to solve existing ones. One problem cannot cover up another problem. Even if a minor problem is masked by a larger one, it remains unresolved.

This is not a complaint or condemnation; rather, it is a factual account of past events and a proposal for reconsideration. It simply describes the current state and the urgent need for change.

This proposal, in summary, aims to evidence all ten activities of jeevan in human tradition. It seeks to evidence understanding through consciousness development and value education. This involves knowing, believing, recognising, and fulfilling. The point of satisfaction for knowing and believing is awakening itself, which is evidenced by resolution, prosperity, fearlessness, and coexistence. This itself is the evidence of realisation. Therefore, every human can make their life meaningful by living based on realisation.

Another benefit of this proposal is that it has no place for priesthood or power-centric rule. It is also free from the idea that only one person will liberate everyone. Each individual can liberate themselves from delusion by attaining understanding.

The notion that the liberation of one person would lead to the liberation of the whole world has proven insufficient, as we have seen. In this proposal, whoever understands it will become liberated. The holy scriptures offer numerous assurances, yet not a single person on Earth has emerged as evidence of their teachings. What, then, is the solution for us? Anything that cannot be integrated into tradition is of no value.

The tradition can only be successful when it is based on understanding, where humans live with humaneness. The tradition of understanding can be established through education, and the tradition of right living comes about by way of family, society, and systems. I too discovered my way of living on the basis of understanding. Living based on understanding must entail resolution and orderliness.

Humans don't become social without evidencing justice. Without justice, humans form sects that are rife with arguments and disputes. In such sects, revolts, rebellions, conflicts and wars inevitably occur.

Given this prevalence of conflict and exploitation, can we truly consider humans to be social? If we justify sectarian struggle, it could eventually lead every individual to resort to violence and war. Why, then, do we restrict that possibility? Therefore, we must reconsider our approach. Properly understanding this prompts us to reflect on our actions, as what we have done thus far has proven insufficient. Thinking is the inherent nature of humans. Every individual can think and search. We must find satisfaction in our own search and also strive to be a source of satisfaction for others.

What should be done to start from here? First, understanding should become accessible to all through education and sanskar. We need to adopt the art of living with understanding - which encompasses how we coexist with Earth, water, air, plants, animals, and humans. We cannot exclude any; we must live in harmony with all of these. Every human being inherently claims that they can realise and evaluate. This claim is a natural, spontaneous zeal within human beings; no one accepts imposition. It is a fundamental need of every human being. How did we end up expecting that we would emancipate everyone, when the source of realisation is inherently present in every human being? It is incredible that all of us have been keeping faith in such assurances. Now, we must consider whether to have faith in assurances or to rely on evidence. From my early days, my tendency has been to trust on the basis of evidence, so I was naturally encouraged by this approach. My search for evidence led me to reconsider. As a result, I am committed to presenting my findings to humankind.

Just as all seven billion people on Earth are currently facing a dead end, you can imagine that I too found myself in a similar situation. I have also navigated through the clutter of modern education, sanskar, and rituals prevalent in the world. However, my acceptance remained neither with modern education nor with traditional idealistic sanskar. My faith could not stabilise in these. This became the basis and reason for my pursuit of absolute objectives. Unable to find faith in either modern education or idealistic tradition, I was compelled to embark on an independent exploration.

Two significant events have occurred. First, I understood jeevan, which inherently contains understanding. Second, I found a way of living with understanding. We operate in four and a half activities on the basis of beliefs and faith. Faith means believing without knowing. Trust means believing after knowing. The ten activities of jeevan become evident when living with trust. I evidence all ten activities, and so can you. Humans must evidence coexistence. The atoms and molecules too exist in orderliness while recognising one another. All the planets, celestial bodies, vegetation, and minerals are in orderliness, evidencing coexistence.

At the fundamental level, all units are energised within themselves to evidence coexistence. This existence is a wonderful manifestation of being energised only. All atomic particles, all atoms, and all molecules have an inherent orientation towards orderliness. This itself is the main inspiration for humans. In my view, every scholar, scientist and lay person needs a coexistence mindset. It is only with this mindset that we can become humane. Anything short of humaneness is not going to give rise to our splendour.

The forests, hills, minerals, and animals that surround us have manifested their grandeur through coexistence alone. They thrive through the way of coexistence. Without coexistence, nothing would be protected. At the fundamental level, every entity is protected, regulated, and energised by Omnipotence. While those working in the form of molecules and biological cells have specific functions, the grandeur of coexistence is evident even in this. The coexistence of one cell (pran kosha) with another cell leads to multicellular forms, resulting in the formation of definite organisms. The method of formation is inherent in the pran sutra (genetic material) situated in the cell. This is called rachna vidhi (genetic code). These pran sutras have continuous search activity in them, which is evidenced by the multitude of diverse organisms we observe. This evidence assures us of the presence of search activity in pran sutras and even in atomic particles.

Imaginativeness and free will are the sources of human search activity. Additionally, the powers of thought, desire, resolve, and realisation-evidence in jeevan remain dedicated to search and exploration. Only through this dedication does the grandeur of all ten activities of jeevan become evident in human living. The primary objective of these ten activities is attaining realisation and being able to live based on realisation. The source of realisation-based living is inherent in jeevan. Humans inherently aspire for wisdom and believe themselves to be wise, realised, judicious, and contemplative. Relationships are present all around in existence. Knowing, believing, recognising, and fulfilling these relationships, and finding mutual satisfaction as a result, itself would be evidence of judiciousness.

Humans are free to choose whether or not they want to become wise. If they choose to become wise then there are always conditions in existence for becoming wise. All the content is available for becoming wise. If they choose not to become wise then existence has content for that as well, but the results of the two choices are different. Happiness or good is not going to happen in ignorance. I have never wanted to live while being tied up with something, as a burden on someone, or while fighting anyone. In the same way, you would also not want to live while being tied up with something, as a burden on someone, or while fighting anyone. No one wants to live being trapped. In this way, every human has a desire within to become wise. They want to live harmoniously with justice and resolution.

The relationships are all around us, yet due to delusion, we fail to recognise them. This is the root cause of our troubles. Once we start to understand and acknowledge these relationships, the inherent values of jeevan begin to flow naturally. Consequently, relationships become fulfilling, leading to mutual satisfaction upon evaluation.

This is how justice manifests. The conditions and methods of recognising relationships arise from their intended purposes. Children recognise 'mother' as the nurturer. The provider of protection is known as 'father'. The source of knowledge and guidance is referred to as 'guru', and the source of curiosity and learning is known as 'disciple'.

The prevailing belief nowadays is that we should strive to live with the efficiency of machines. But is a human truly a machine? Can anyone own up and answer this question? I assert that humans are not machines; rather, they are the creators of all machines ever devised. A machine can never come close to emulating human capabilities. In fact, any machine will always fall short in comparison to humans. Therefore, a machine can never truly understand a human. Furthermore, all machines are made from insentient nature. Every machine constructed thus far has been made from entities of the material order alone. It's noteworthy that not a single machine has been created from entities of biological order, still they boast that humans are machines! How far would this be appropriate for human tradition? How would this satisfy the intent of comprehensive resolution in humans? While it may be ingrained in contemporary thought that humans are nothing more than machines and consumers, the reality is quite different. When one experiences the bond with their child, they undoubtedly recognise that they are not merely mechanical entities.

I recognised humans with humane consciousness only. Humane consciousness is the combined form of conscience and sensitivity. If I am not sensitive, I become like a machine. We humans have not yet found satisfaction in such mechanistic living. We have been unable to find satisfaction while working like machines. I challenge any guru who claims to have found such a path. Even after listening to geneticists, I remain unconvinced. Similarly, neither materialistic nor relativistic theories have succeeded in defining the human being. If human nature could be fully analysed based on these theories, then they could be accepted. Otherwise, humans should be acknowledged for what they truly are. This proposal aims to recognise humans as they truly are.

Before this, idealism presented God as the one responsible for deliverance. I have seen God; He does not have a factory for deliverance. In what form did I see God? I saw God as Omnipresence. I saw God as the absolute energy in which every unit is energised. I have seen that every unit in Omnipresence is in coexistence. What more is there to be seen in God? If there is anything more, you are welcome to explore and reveal it to the world! You are free to explore. What I have seen and understood has already been presented before you.

We have failed to achieve completeness through either sensitivity or machine-like efficiency. Sensory contact becomes the focus in the way of sensitivity. Thus, one discovers that their sensory capacity and expectations differ even from those of their own brother. This necessitates dividing humans based on their sensitivity. Consequently, the path of sensitivity leads humans towards individualism. Similarly, the pursuit of machine-like efficiency propels humans towards individualism through consumerism, as we have already witnessed. The third path, bestowed upon us by our ancestors, is devotionism and asceticism. There is no end to individualism here either. Despite all the hard work, tireless efforts, and best intentions of humans, everything has ended up in failure due to individualism. Individualism is anti-coexistence and has become the basis for the fragmentation of humankind.

Where can one live apart from coexistence? The simple solution for living in coexistence is to know, believe, and recognise coexistence within humans. If this is recognised, then one becomes capable of living in orderliness and participating in the universal orderliness, about which we will study subsequently. Such living includes living in coexistence with the animal world and the plant world as well. If we take something from the plant world, then we should have something to give back as well. If we want to only take and not give anything, it is selfishness, which ultimately leads to frustration and suffering. The events unfolding today serve as a testament to this reality.

To live in coexistence, it is essential to ascertain our coexistence with the mineral, plant, and animal worlds. Failure to do so renders us neither scholars, scientists, nor wise. In essence, our knowledge, science, and wisdom remain incomplete without this fundamental understanding. How will we live without the plants, Earth, mountains, minerals, and animals? We have to live with all these. All this matter, treasures, and splendours of nature have to exist along with us. These need to exist, and we need to coexist with them.

Humans are central to ensuring this coexistence. Humans, being in delusion, have lived in frustration and suffering. Now, there is a need to turn the tide. Humans need to awaken and recognise coexistence with everything. The way of recognising coexistence, I found, is to see that all these are present in Omnipotence (Space), which is the first testimony of coexistence. The biological order has emerged, is influenced, and has a continuity of its splendour from the material order. The biological order in itself is effective, evident, and splendorous in the form of orderliness. The animal world is also evident in the form of inherent orderliness. Humans need to evidence their inherent orderliness.

How will humans understand their self and inherentness? Self should also be understood, and inherentness should also be understood. One understands both self and inherentness from jeevan vidya. I recognise jeevan in the form of 'self', and so can you. We remain in delusion till we believe the body to be the self. I started living in orderliness from the moment I recognised jeevan as 'self'. You will also be able to live thus. Orderliness is not going to happen before that. Understanding this is such a natural, co-existentially complete process, where jeevan is the entity that understands, and jeevan itself is the entity to be understood.

According to idealists, liberation occurs when drishhta (the one who sees), drishya (that which is to be seen), and darshan (the knowledge from seeing) becomes one. According to them God is the drishhta, God is the drishya and God is the darshan. A great deal has been written based on these premises. Still, it is not understood - What is God? Where is God? Why is God? In spite of this, people listen to such discourses because it feels good. It has been observed that the gap between feeling good and being good remains unchanged. Subsequently, some began to describe humans as machines. This concept too did not succeed, yet they continued to advocate for it. Just as they couldn't adequately explain God, yet persisted in discussing it. In this way, we have become stuck, unable to think of anything beyond this. The way out of this situation is to begin with the premise that jeevan is eternal and body is a recurring event for jeevan. The body gets formed in the womb. An atom attains jeevan status upon development through a natural process in existence.

The body gets formed and deformed repeatedly. Biological cells, which constitute the body, have a limited lifespan after which they decompose. The human body, particularly the brain, represents the pinnacle of evolutionary completeness in the biological order. On this basis, I assert that humans are capable of conveying the knowledge of the entire existence to others. The brain's purpose culminates in this ability. Consequently, the human body, formed through successive explorations of rachna vidhi (the genetic code) in pran sutras, is the most advanced formation of biological order. If there is anything left to be discovered, it will be in the future. Meanwhile, what should we do in our lifetimes? We must evidence jeevan's awakening. As we humans embarked on this journey, our sensitivity could not be concealed, neither by science nor by idealism. Numerous penances have been suggested to subdue the senses, and many ascetics have practised them on Earth. However, their penance did not lead to the definitive understanding that humans have yearned for—an understanding that could manifest in behaviour and tradition. It is now up to these ascetics to testify to what they have discovered. Ordinary people have followed these ascetics in expectation of miracles and supernatural feats, much like being in a trance. Let me clarify that existence does not hold miracles or supernatural phenomena. Existence operates with definite orderliness, outcomes, accomplishments, and milestones, and these have continuity—I have observed and understood this. All humans aspire to reach such a definitive destination, which can only be achieved through a definitive method. We cannot attain the definitive destination of humanity without studying humans as a reality within existence. Neither can we achieve this by disregarding the study of humans and proclaiming cockroaches as the most evolved species, nor by destroying Earth with chemical fertilisers and insecticides. Humans will not reach their destination by treating human intellect as a commodity or using it for exploitation, which is termed as “intellectual property right.” The highest institutions and judicial courts of the world are seeking to accept and legalise intellectual property rights. Jeevan's powers are inexhaustible—how can these be classified or treated as commodities? Can anyone provide an answer? Have these proposals been made with an understanding of jeevan? To what extent would this be beneficial for humankind? In my experience, the powers of jeevan do not diminish regardless of how extensively they are used. This is something that anyone can experience and verify. The more jeevan's powers are used, the more renewed and radiant they become.

The powers of jeevan are boundless and cannot be depleted through use. Attempting to quantify these powers only leads to frustration. This illustrates how we succumb to intellectualism, becoming commodities to be exploited, leading to slavery and the foundation of exploitation. In my opinion, it is fundamentally against humanity and coexistence to exploit human intellect, to use it as a source of conflict, or to claim ownership over it. To suggest that a just society can be built upon the trade of human intellect is a falsehood that warrants serious consideration. I firmly believe that the notion of limited human intellect is a blatant lie. Every individual possesses an inexhaustible intellectual capacity that transcends the confines of books. I, myself, am greater than all the books I have written, just as every human is greater than all the books combined. Until we accept this truth, I don't think we can do anything wisely.

After all this discussion, perhaps everyone can think through and accept that which is right. We must become wise; that is the only final conclusion that emerges. There are no major difficulties in becoming wise. The difficulties are only while we experiment in ignorance. Earth is an indivisible whole, yet humans create divisions and perceive it as separate nations. Moreover, we deploy armies along these divisions and engage in conflict repeatedly. Fragmenting the Earth is not feasible, and no one would survive such fragmentation. Is there any merit in believing that the Earth is divided? This prompts us to reflect on the depth of deception we have succumbed to. Consider another example: our classification of humans based on skin colour and race, treating them as if they were animals. What sort of intelligence is this? The true measure of humans lies in their understanding, not in their skin colour or race. History is replete with instances such as revolts against slavery and feudalism. Feudalism has given way to democracy, yet we have not succeeded in establishing systems based on socialistic and humanistic principles, despite believing that we have. The lie lies in our belief that we have achieved, when in reality, all that we have achieved is some amenities of comfort. Wars, conflicts, and exploitation still persist. The sources of deception lie in the concept of the nation, rooted in the false belief in Earth's fragmentation, and in the idea of a Constitution based on power-centric rule. They say Nation and Constitution are above everything. The essence of this Constitution is - power-centric rule.

What is a power-centric rule? It is the attempt to stop one mistake by committing another, to stop one crime by perpetrating another, and to stop one war by inciting another. Some constitutions include provisions for providing basic facilities to all.

The underlying rationale here is that if everyone possesses wealth, they can fend for themselves. 'We must struggle to survive,' they proclaim. According to them, our identity is defined solely by our capacity to endure hardship. But do these proclamations hold any truth? They serve as the foundation of numerous falsehoods. Our concepts of family, education, business, and more are built upon these falsehoods. Consequently, we find ourselves submerged beneath layers of deceit. While some strive to break free, the majority remain ensnared. We desire to change education to overcome this predicament.

We are now ready to evidence the ten activities of jeevan. Every human has a tacit acceptance of jeevan's existence, since every human claims to be alive on their own. Still, we don't understand what jeevan is? What is the purpose of jeevan? Who studies jeevan? I have understood the ten activities of jeevan, practised these in living, and these have become evident in me. Let's first become familiar with the names of ten activities of jeevan.

1. Atma: - atma is a part of jeevan which attains realisation in coexistence. I have seen it as the nucleus. It remains active as the nucleus of a constitutionally complete atom. All other activities of jeevan take place in its first, second, third and fourth orbits. There are only two activities in the nucleus of jeevan atom - realisation (anubhav) and authenticity (pramanikta) - which have been evidenced in me.

2. Buddhi: - I have seen two activities: enlightenment (bodh) of realisation-evidence and resolve (sankalp) happening in the first orbit of jeevan. The resolve activity is for evidencing the realisation-evidence, which is called resoluteness (ritambhara).
3. Chitta: - The second orbit has two activities: contemplation (chintan) and visualisation (chitran).
4. Vritti: - The third orbit has two activities: deliberation (tulan) and analysis (vishleshan).
5. Mun: - The fourth orbit has two activities: taste (asvadan) and selection (chayan). These are all the ten activities of jeevan.

Until now, humans have only manifested four and a half activities of jeevan, deliberating solely with the perspectives of pleasure, health, and profit. They have operated based on sensitivity, which originates from the body's senses. However, it is jeevan itself that animates these senses. The root of delusion lies in identifying jeevan with the body. Once jeevan identifies with the body, it is bound to function according to bodily needs. This adherence to 'belief'—rather than 'knowledge'—forms the basis of delusion.

What should be there instead? Jeevan should be recognised as jeevan, and the body as the body. Evaluating jeevan and the body naturally occurs based on their respective purposes. When this occurs, living with humane consciousness and orderliness ensues. Without this assessment, disorder in human life is inevitable. Orderliness in human existence necessitates evaluating jeevan based on its purpose and the body based on its utility. The body serves as a vessel for jeevan's awakening in human tradition.

Humans have not created the human body; upon birth, when a child is already alive due to jeevan's presence, we mistakenly identify the body as jeevan itself. Over time, the child adopts this misconception, perpetuating the cycle. To break free from this cycle, guardians and parents must attain wisdom.

A child's body forms in the womb and is driven by a jeevan. This jeevan, already present in nature, begins to animate the body from the fourth or fifth month of pregnancy. Thus, jeevan and body unite within the womb. It's essential to understand that jeevan is distinct from the body. This distinction becomes apparent when we consider that no part of the body anticipates or expects justice, dharma, or truth. However, we expect and anticipate justice, dharma, and truth from every human being. These expectations being fulfilled is the manifestation of the ten activities of jeevan.

Jeevan has to be there with the body for it to be alive. 'Jeevan' starts evidencing the two activities of mun that are taste (asvadan) and selection (chayan) from the infant stage itself. Subsequently, analysis (vishleshan) takes place in vritti, but deliberation (tulan) happens based on pleasure, health and profit only. One of the activities of chitta – visualisation (chitran) – we do anyway. Humans have visualised and accomplished all the objects of their common and special aspirations because of visualisation activity. Even after accomplishing these, we could not achieve orderliness.

Idealism presented lofty ideals in various forms, while materialism and its three obsessions (for sex, consumption, and profit) fostered a culture of comfort and accumulation through education and training programmes. However, despite these efforts, widespread comfort and accumulation remained elusive. We deluded ourselves into believing that these achievements were the result of our excellence and humanity, a rightful reward for our struggle and exploitation. It's both laughable and pitiful to assume that through these, we have fulfilled all human needs or comprehensively understood human nature.

Consider the biological sciences, which focus solely on the body's structure and functions yet claim to impart the study of the human being. Can we truly understand a human being by dissecting the body, counting muscles and bones? Can we grasp the essence of a human being by examining eyes, ears, and other bodily organs? Such practices perpetuate a cycle of deception within human tradition. We boast of having understood human beings and mastering existence, yet in reality, we are burdened by our own lies.

Now, we face two options: either free ourselves from this burden or perish beneath its weight. We are taught that destiny corrects its course by itself, and after humans have done all the excesses they can, conditions may arise where humans cannot even survive on Earth.

There's already a lot of noise about the environment, with estimates on who will survive and who will perish. Some countries hope to safeguard their nation, while some religions seek salvation for their followers. They find solace in the belief of a saviour, referred to as God, Paramatma, deity, avatar, or messiah. Such narratives often imply that only followers of a certain faith will be saved, while others are doomed. But where does this lead us? What does such thinking achieve?

In my view, both State and Religion are at a loss when it comes to education. Religious institutions lack a universal foundation for dharma, devoid of education and evidence. So, where does dharma stand?

Similarly, in all the seats of State, there is no concept of State which we could call universal. They proclaim the need to work towards saving the State. But how will they achieve that? Through struggle, they say. Struggle is all about revolt, rebellion, exploitation, and war. Who prepares these four – nature or humans? Upon examination, it becomes clear that humans, driven by delusion, are the ones who perpetrate all this.

The two most dominant seats of power—Religion and State—wield all the resources and authority. Yet, they fail to provide solutions for the human condition. It's futile to seek answers from the profit-driven seat of commerce, which is inherently exploitative. Similarly, when questioned, the seat of education falls short in offering clear guidance or purpose. So, what is the common person to do? None of these institutions offer direction. The courageous path forward lies in discovering or forging a new way. This path embodies understanding, honesty, responsibility, and participation. The path of conflict leads nowhere; humans cannot fulfil their needs through conflict, yet it remains ingrained in our tradition. Isn't this also a significant delusion? Now, the only sensible course of action is that we become wise. Understanding is verified within oneself through acceptance and the study of developed consciousness. You cannot attain understanding by examining me; you will become wise only when you examine yourself. For thirty years of my life, I kept examining others fruitlessly, finding no trace of understanding. I found understanding only when I examined myself after my sadhana of twenty-five years. I aim to share the fruits of this journey with humanity in a format conducive to study. This is an endeavour in this course.

By now, it must have become indicated to you that coexistence itself is the ultimate truth. Living in coexistence is our ultimate dharma - if this becomes clear, then all the understanding required for it is within your grasp. It's very simple. According to me, living a lie is more difficult than living truthfully. Truthful living is simpler, I have seen it by living. Living was so difficult when I was surrounded with questions. When I found the resolution, I became free from all questions, and life became simple. If this resonates with you as well, it will only strengthen my conviction. Those who are with me have experienced it; if you desire the same, you too can verify it. The verification of this proposal begins from deliberation whether our behaviour is according to justice. Have we understood relationships and are we able to fulfil them? Are we able to evaluate the inherent values in relationships? Are we able to reach the point of mutual satisfaction or not? These are all aspects of verification. As we embark on this journey of verification, we realise that there is no certainty in the perspectives of pleasure, health, and profit. That which I find pleasant, may not be pleasant to you. That which I feel is healthy, may not feel healthy to you. The level of profit that satisfies you may not suffice for me. All humans are ensnared in this trap. Therefore, equality cannot be based on the perspectives of pleasure, health, and profit.

To break free from this trap, we need to replace the three perspectives of deliberation (pleasure, health, and profit) with three alternative perspectives: justice, dharma, and truth. As we begin deliberating from the perspective of justice, it is called contemplation. Justice is comprehended only upon recognising relationships within the framework of orderliness. As relationships are recognised, fulfilment of values commences, culminating in evaluation and mutual satisfaction. This is what justice entails—satisfying both sides in a balanced manner. It cannot be deemed just if both sides are not content. Someone once asked me what should be done with those who commit crimes or wrongs. They do so because we fail to guide them towards wisdom. Why do you focus on criminals and not on those who are righteous? For instance, I don't commit any crimes or wrongs. Many others like me abstain from criminal acts, and we don't have any problems with them. How can you ignore or deny this reality? It serves as evidence for you to consider. Now the crucial question arises: do you have a need for this understanding or not? From my perspective, you need this understanding above all else. All humans are eagerly awaiting this understanding alone. The only difference between you and me is that I took a step forward out of my anguish, attained this understanding, and have become capable of attesting to it. You, too, will bear witness in the same manner once you grasp the immense happiness and satisfaction that comes from living in accordance with justice. It is not solely for my testimony; you can also testify. All humans will become capable of testifying in the same way once they understand.

The understanding will be disseminated through educational institutions. An educational institution is a collective expression of all parents and guardians. Education is the activity of evidencing the understanding upon enlightenment. Without understanding, enlightenment of evidence – there is no education. The responsibility for imparting understanding lies with educational institutions and all parents and guardians. Every family is intricately linked with education. Hence, contemplating the unification, privatization, or nationalization of educational institutions has not proven beneficial in the past, nor will it be in the future. The parents and guardians should be directly recognised as educational institutions. This approach alone will prove beneficial for humankind, as it aligns with the principles of understanding.

We must become proficient at dispensing justice. The capacity of dispensing justice will need to become evident in us. Only when we acquire these two qualities can we truly dispense justice, and only then can we claim to have understood. Without understanding, how can we do justice? When even the judges in the highest courts lack understanding of justice, what hope is there for ordinary people? Justice is the minimum requirement for human living. The evidence of justice is in the form of humane conduct. Anything short of humane conduct has no justice at all. More than that is not even needed.

Jeevan has six activities functioning with contemplation (chintan). We have done a great deal of analysis (vishleshan) for pleasure, health and profit. We have been able to produce a lot of things related to our common and special aspirations. Apart from these, we have also produced things such as bombs, missiles, and warships which are not useful for humans. These things are meaningless and are causes of destruction. It can be understood by logic and also by seeing the events in the history.

Humans engage with realities existentially, logically and behaviourally. We want to become happy existentially. As we become happy existentially, we evidence this existential realisation in our behaviour only through logic. Logic is the basis with which we do everything like reading, writing, and talking. Meaningful logic touches existentiality, which is the magnificence of communication. My communication is meaningful if existentiality becomes indicated through it to another person. Meaningfulness of behaviour is in instilling the understanding in other that the human purpose is resolution, prosperity, fearlessness and coexistence. This is how realisation in behavioural knowledge takes place. This is also the way existential knowledge takes place in another person. Therefore, logic is needed both for existential knowledge and behavioural knowledge.

The first accomplishment of this knowledge is we having the basis of our own evaluation and evaluation of our family members. The evaluation will be on the basis of values, relationships, and evidence of mutual satisfaction. We can evidence being judicious in our behaviour. It is only then that a human becomes humane. Thereafter, one becomes autonomous based on understanding and attains the following six merits.

1. Self-confidence
2. Respect for Excellence
3. Balance in Talent
4. Balance in Personality
5. Social in Behaviour
6. Self-reliant in Vocation

It is upon attaining these six merits that I felt to have attained autonomy. Hence, I became capable of evidencing my understanding and prosperity in the family. I am presenting it before you with this truthfulness. Every person must be wanting to become civilised, while the minimum qualification for civility is justice. Justice, as I see it, is - relationship, values, evaluation and mutual satisfaction. After this, I also understood that every human seeks justice from the moment of their birth. They naturally want to work and behave correctly. They naturally speak the truth. On this basis, what should be the content of education? Every human child should be enlightened, they should get practice to do correct work and behaviour, and the capability of delivering justice should be instilled in them. All of these three aspects need to be there in an educational institution, which will pave the way for humane tradition on its own. Humane tradition will not happen without this.

Humane tradition has to start with justice. The core of justice is in understanding that our relationship with natural surroundings is timeless and our relationship with other humans is continuous. When someone makes a mistake then where do they go for guidance? First someone from their family, who lives with justice, gives guidance. If not from family then someone in the village gives guidance. If there is nobody to guide in the village also, then they will try looking for someone in their country or the whole Earth. It is a natural human tendency. Every human has a natural tendency for reforming themselves somewhere or the other.

It has become evident that the world wants a change, but what change they want was not clear so far. This proposal addresses it. Education alone will result in dissemination of this proposal. There should be provision for humane education in the educational institutions.

We will have to impart the understanding for every person to become evidence of living with justice. We will have to impart study of sentience along with science for this. Unless we understand sentience, we cannot grasp the understanding of existence, and if we don't understand existence then how will we understand its orderliness. The one who understands existence is jeevan (unit of sentience). Therefore, the study of jeevan has to be incorporated in education. Psychology needs to incorporate the sanskar aspect (understanding) i.e. the aspect of humane consciousness. Humane consciousness is the grandeur of both conscience and sensitivity. Philosophy should be taught with a realised human as its evidence. On doing so, the way of humaneness will prevail - and not materialism or spiritualism. Therefore, humans can become wise, and existence is always available for understanding.

My realisation about evidence is that it lies in enabling others to understand, learn, and do, as I have understood, learnt, and done. Evidence is necessary in all these three aspects, and there isn't a fourth aspect to it. It is acceptable if our learning and doing falls short, but understanding must be complete. So far, we have accomplished much in learning and doing, but we are nowhere in terms of understanding. At present, learning and doing are considered to be the most valuable, but this has brought us neither resolution nor relief, and we continue getting stuck somewhere or the other. Therefore, the need has arisen for humans to study the entire existence and gain self-confidence. It becomes natural for humans to demonstrate understanding after study and practice. Humans must verify their understanding through their own study and practice.

The study of humans was left behind in the pursuit of idealism and materialism. In Idealism the deities and God are considered to be above all, and humans got left behind. They sacrificed study of humans in an attempt to understand the deities and God. Materialism too left humans aside, brought machines to the fore by experimentation method, and made machines the basis of evidence. While scriptures, books and literature became the evidence in idealism, the machine became the evidence in materialism. In this way, humans got under-valued, and being trapped in delusion they ended up only furthering that delusion. Thus, being trapped in delusion, led to humans suffering, becoming frustrated, and harassed. Now how will the deliverance of humans come about? All seats of power have been giving such assurances, but there is no evidence of deliverance. How long can it go on like this?

The alternative proposed here is - understanding is the fundamental source of human deliverance. The highest authority for fostering this understanding lies within the education system. Education should encompass the study of consciousness alongside science. How can we study coexistence without exploring consciousness? These two critical aspects have remained untouched in educational institutions, their content, and pedagogy. Secondly, in psychology, humane consciousness is studied, understood and evidenced. Therefore, the aspect of sanskar should be integrated into psychological studies. Thirdly, philosophical studies must be grounded in evidence.

Our belief until now has been that one who can repeat what they have read, has become 'learned'. However, this does not truly make one learned. True wisdom embodies understanding, with knowledge being natural and aligned with the realities of existence. Without understanding coexistence, jeevan, and humane conduct, one cannot be genuinely learned.

As these aspects are understood, a coherent thought process develops, leading to planning and the creation of structured programs, ultimately resulting in verifiable outcomes. Without understanding, how can we develop a meaningful thought process?

In the absence of understanding, one prevalent way of thinking is the pursuit of comfort and accumulation. The other is idealism, which focuses on renunciation, non-accumulation, detachment, and devotion. Millions have devoted themselves to idealism, demonstrating their courage, patience, and dedication. Yet, neither of these ideologies has led to the emergence of an indivisible society.

Humans have worked tirelessly but without a clear, universal human goal or direction. My endeavour was solely to find answers to my questions. I had no aspirations of attaining heaven, wealth, or material accumulation. My only resolve was that if I had a doubt, I would inevitably find the answer.

I will now explain the meaning of 'yog' and 'sanyog'. The meaning of yog is coming together. For example, if we are going somewhere and we come across a rock, or another person – that's called yog. Sanyog means to come together for completeness. Completeness means humans living in orderliness. The ultimate completeness means humans becoming authentic. Humans inherently want to live in orderliness and become authentic, but when that want is not fulfilled, they helplessly get moulded according to tradition. Yog and sanyog are always there in existence. There have been many efforts in history for completeness (their becoming successful is another matter). Humans have made many sacrifices for achieving completeness. Sacrifices eventually lead to something.

In the process of breaking a boulder, the success becomes visible with the final strike, but it is the cumulative effect of all preceding strikes that makes the final strike successful. The success I achieved is also due to the contribution of all prior efforts. Therefore, I acknowledge that this event is a result of the entire humankind's collective contribution. A significant benefit of this understanding is that it prevented me from becoming arrogant about my success. Additionally, very few people who exhibit arrogance have approached me. Even those who initially displayed arrogance experienced a reduction in their egotism after a few interactions.

Everyone who met me did so with civility, simplicity, and naturalness. However, this doesn't mean that everyone who met me accepted my ideas. Many people did not, and I respect their stance as well. It is not their fault; they are burdened by tradition. Consequently, I remain content whether someone accepts my ideas or not. Each human being carries the seed of righteousness within them, and the sanyog must occur for this seed to flourish. When and how this will happen, we cannot predict. Every human desires good to prevail. I aim to bring the possibilities of its realisation within reach.

Sanyog occurs when humans come together for the sake of resolution, orderliness, and the creation of an indivisible society. It is not merely a meeting of like-minded individuals. For instance, the meeting of two thieves or two robbers is not sanyog as it does not aim for resolution and orderliness.

As I became capable of living with justice, my family itself became the practice ground of my authenticity. As one starts living with justice, they start gaining the acceptance of their family. After living with justice in my family, I started getting recognised for my righteousness among the families of our friends also. After this, living with justice became my intrinsic nature, and I became capable of conveying my righteous identity to visitors as well.

Every human has an innate desire for meaningfulness and success. Our understanding is the source of this noble desire, and we can never ignore this source. Good is acceptable to everyone; all humans desire goodness and are waiting for it to manifest. As we wait, the issue of relationships arises. Understanding relationships involves recognising their inherent purpose (values). This recognition is the essence of study.

Once the purpose of relationships is understood, one naturally becomes dedicated and subsequently achieves mastery. Mastery invariably bears fruit. This method of achieving success is quite simple. Comprehensive resolution is fundamentally linked with all relationships.

The purpose of relationships is comprehensive resolution, meaning all relationships aim for resolution and happiness. It is only with this resolution that we love, become grateful, make friends, trust, engage in social behaviour, and experience happiness. Values such as care, guidance, trust, affection, gratitude, glory, love, reverence, and respect form the basis of our interactions. Gratitude acknowledges any help we receive for our comprehensive resolution. With gratitude, other values start to manifest. Following gratitude, the values of affection, love, and trust naturally develop.

There is no one who has never received help in some form or another. It is through everyone's help that a person grows, becomes autonomous, and is evidenced. All relationships (the seven relationships) have continuity when values are realised within them. Relationships without values lack continuity. Even in daily life, we interact well with those we recognise as part of our relationships.

Traditionally, we identify relationships based on power, wealth, intelligence, or age. However, in reality, our relationships are meant first for evidencing comprehensive resolution, second for nurturing, third for protection, fourth for usefulness and complementariness, fifth for right-use, and sixth for purposeful-use. Authenticity is the highest priority in relationships. Everyone is satisfied on the basis of authenticity. Values naturally emerge from jeevan. For example, when you and I meet, trust develops naturally through the flow of values.

This approach allows us to recognise values in our relationships, evaluate them, and achieve mutual satisfaction. What greater benefit is there? Until now, we recognised relationships based on fear and temptation, but now we prioritise values, evaluation, resolution, and prosperity. Fear and temptation are not values, so their evaluation is meaningless. Fear and temptation are two sides of the same coin. Their temporary use might bring some order, but the underlying issue remains.

Even in courts, justice cannot be truly delivered because it cannot be based on fear and temptation. For centuries, humans have made compromises based on fear and temptation, but this has not brought about any lasting order. We can agree that fear and temptation are not values and cannot be evaluated in relationships.

Humans haven't truly grasped values yet. If they had, values would be expressed, evidenced, evaluated, and justice would occur naturally. Judicial courts pass judgments; they don't administer justice. One side consents to these judgments out of fear, while the other side consents out of temptation. Mutual satisfaction was never achieved there, nor can it be. We have been completely incapable of achieving justice. Despite this, we claim to have made progress. It is for you to decide what such development truly means.

Every human naturally desires to be free from fear and temptation. Living without these is beneficial for both humans and their natural surroundings. Relationships are based on purpose. The purpose is resolution, prosperity, fearlessness, and coexistence. The process for this is living in orderliness. Living in orderliness means participating in all five dimensions. These five dimensions are: 1. Education-Sanskar, 2. Justice-Security. 3. Health-Restraint, 4. Production-Work, 5. Exchange-Reserve

In this way, by living orderly in a family and participating in the five dimensions, we become participants in the universal orderliness. This brings continuous joy, well-being, and indomitable courage to humans. Dharma follows justice. Dharma means the enlightenment of realisation-evidence in buddhi, i.e., resolution. Resolution is the dharma of humans. Living in orderliness is the dharma of humans, which is the state of comprehensive resolution. When humans live in disorder, they become trapped in problems; when they live in orderliness, they remain resolved. Humans do not want to be trapped in problems; they want to be resolved. Resolution equals happiness; human dharma is happiness. Problems equal suffering; humans do not want suffering.

Resolution cannot be attained based on fear and temptation, yet the whole world is bent on finding resolution that way. Even today, we educate and train to build systems based on fear and temptation, but orderliness cannot come from these. The moment anything is built based on fear and temptation, the process of its disintegration begins immediately.

Orderliness at any level – family, industry, governance, or State – can only be achieved based on values and evaluation. Orderliness means that humans can exhibit their authenticity, fulfil justice, and participate.

The education-sanskar system aims to impart the formula of understanding to every family, individual, and child. This process can also be referred to as the dissemination of understanding. As mentioned earlier, first comes the holistic view (darshan), followed by ideology (vaad), then treatises (shastra), and finally, plans (yojana). One of these plans is the Jeevan Vidya Plan, which enables any family to achieve humane consciousness. With this understanding, one can live in orderliness within the family.

The second plan is the Humanisation of Education, which provides a system of education for children. We implemented this education system at a school in Bijnor, Uttar Pradesh, over a period of five years. This experience allowed us to observe the impact of humanising education based on Jeevan Vidya.

People often say that the environment influences students, a notion I have always disagreed with. If the environment had such an overriding effect, how could I have succeeded in my exploration? Evidence from this school shows that children influence their families, and in turn, families influence their environment. The children began to see themselves as jeevan (conscious beings) rather than merely as bodies, and they recognised the necessity of living in orderliness.

As a result, many children started losing interest in television and frivolous talks, evaluating them as meaningless. Additionally, conflicts, fights, and ill-will among families in the village began to diminish. To my knowledge, these villages now experience fewer disputes and conflicts. I assert that the environment shaped by the children's conduct had a significant impact, and on this basis, I claim that this education system is effective.

As part of the humanisation of education plan, we will impart the study of the sentient aspect along with science. Study of sentient aspect means study of jeevan and its awakening. We will study composition and decomposition in the physicochemical world, how it is complementary for humans and how humans can be complementary and useful for these. Along with this, we will study the activity aspect in alternative philosophy, which is to say that philosophy is for the understanding of human beings. Understanding should be evidenced. When we build our identities with understanding only coexistence is recognised in our relationships, values are fulfilled, and mutual satisfaction results.

Orderliness is a perpetual truth in coexistence. Each unit in existence has inherent orderliness. For example - oak-ness is the inherentness in an oak tree. A peepal tree maintains its definite conduct with all its fruits, seeds and leaves exhibiting peepal's properties, intrinsic nature and dharma. In the same way, the conduct of entire units of plant world and animal world is definite, each exhibiting their respective definite conducts. This is inherent orderliness. The conduct of humans could not become definite until now, because humans could not live in orderliness until now. We humans haven't accomplished orderliness yet but we have reached the point of feeling that it is needed.

We will need to live with the inherent orderliness of humans to accomplish it. What is the inherentness of humans? Inherentness in humans is humaneness, or humane conduct, consisting of values, character and ethics. The evidence of values is relationships, values, evaluation, and mutual satisfaction - which has to be there in a family. Mutual satisfaction is essential for a family and more than that is not even needed. This itself is humaneness. This will happen when humans spontaneously live with values. The issue of character will need to be addressed for living in orderliness. Character has been recognised as rightfully owned wealth, marital faithfulness, and kindness in work and behaviour. Ethics are the right-use and protection of resources in the form of body, mind and wealth – which leads to fearlessness (trust) in human living. This is the description of humane conduct in which humans can live nicely with assurance.

Now we come to the definition of a human being: "A human is one who materialises ideas." This means that a human being actualises whatever comes to their mind (like building a machine, a house, etc.) and lives in the hope of mental well-being or happiness. Happiness is the dharma of humans. Through this understanding, we grasp the essence of values, character, and ethics.

According to this definition, humans have achieved the aspect of materialising ideas. There are two types of idea materialisation: one for common aspirations (food, shelter, clothing) and the other for special aspirations (telecommunication and transportation). However, evidence of humane conduct is absent today. It is neither found in education nor in the Constitution. The Constitution lacks any provision for evaluating humane conduct. Any power-centric Constitution does not include provisions for evidencing humane conduct, as it is not inherently humane. Consequently, humane conduct cannot be expected from such a constitution.

No one has been able to evidence humane conduct based on this system. Humans have neither mustered the courage for such evaluation nor gathered such understanding. Humans will not be able to live happily and will continue to fight unless these deficiencies are addressed. Understanding is the only way out of this messy situation. The humanisation of education is crucial for this purpose.

We will integrate the study of the conscious aspect (jeevan) in science, the activity aspect of nature in philosophy, the sanskar aspect in psychology, and human and humaneness aspects in geography and history. By incorporating humaneness into education, humans will naturally tend to live in orderliness and evidence themselves.

It is only with our true identity (of humaneness) that we will live with the possibility, necessity, and success of resolution, prosperity, fearlessness, and coexistence. Therefore, education and sanskar become complete only with humaneness, not by any other means. The sanskars we talk about at present are based solely on our prevalent beliefs, and they lack universality.

The third point is the 'truth'. What is the truth? Truth is to understand existence in the form of coexistence. One understands existential orderliness upon understanding truth. Existence is studied only in the form of nature saturated in Omnipotence. Humans and the rest of nature are complementary to one another. As one develops the lifestyle according to this understanding, it only results in humane orderliness. Once this is understood, we will live only in justice, we will live only in orderliness, and we will evidence only authenticity in our families and in our behaviour. We will not engage in power-centric rule. In this way, we reach the point of complete assurance, trust, and prosperity.

At present, it is taught in science that all that exists is basically chaos and uncertainty. Upon studying this, students start believing that they are also in chaos, and in turn, they start spreading chaos. Earth's present condition illustrates this clearly. Earth's temperature is rising. What is the root cause? The temperature is rising due to the extraction of minerals, coal, and petroleum from the Earth's interior. They know, and we know, how and why the temperature has risen. Coal and petroleum are the only substances that absorb heat, and once we extracted these heat-absorbing substances, it was natural for the Earth's temperature to rise. This rise in temperature has resulted in the rise of sea levels. How much could the sea levels rise? The place where we are sitting could have water levels two to three hundred feet high. Only a few hilltops might be left above water. This is how we have become stuck. Many developed nations call out saying, "Let us fix this situation together." We know very well from history who started it. We extracted coal and petroleum without understanding, which is an assault on Earth. We can test whether Earth could recover only after these assaults stop. How will these stop? We will talk about it later. Humans survive on Earth from very low to very high temperatures. Human body temperature remains the same everywhere despite so much variation in outside temperature. How does this happen? The body has substances that keep its temperature balanced. In the same way, coal and petroleum are the substances that maintain Earth's temperature.

The present challenge is how can we stop the extraction of coal and petroleum? One solution could be to harness the energy from the powerful flow of rivers on the surface of the Earth. We can generate 50 times more electricity than our requirement this way. We need to develop efficient turbines for this. Second, there are some machines which only run with oil; for these, we will need to make engines that run with vegetable oil. There are oilseed vegetations which could be grown in large quantities, I think. Third, solar energy is already in focus; it needs more urgent attention. We need to make more and more machines and industries work with solar energy. In this way, we understand that there is more energy than our requirements available on Earth's surface. We can stop the use of coal and petroleum by replacing them with alternative sources of energy. It is only then can we test Earth's capacity to heal from the wounds inflicted by humans so far.

There's one more sword hanging over our heads. If we analyse the event of water formation, when it first occurred on Earth, we will find that this event was caused by the conjunction of cosmic rays. Cosmic rays are the only cause of this event, and subsequently, the continuity of water has become established on Earth. There has been degradation in Earth's environment. This could lead to the possibility of the same cosmic rays affecting in an adverse manner and causing water to disappear from Earth. Scientists have identified all the sources which have caused damage to the environment. Merely identifying these sources will not fix the damage; we need to rebuild.

Rebuilding requires us to first stop the excesses we have been committing against Earth. We read in newspapers how the extraction of fossil fuels, coal, and the use of poisonous materials in warfare have caused immense damage to Earth's shield, i.e., the atmosphere. If it is true, then we will have to stop all such activities. It is a great quality of humans that they think of reparation after causing damage, a quality not found in animals. However, humans haven't done anything to repair the damage they have caused to the environment. On the contrary, it is getting worse by the day. How long can it go on like this? Will we ever do anything to repair the damage we have inflicted on Earth?

Earth has kept provisioning for humans to live safely, but humans with all their intelligence rebelled, attacked and exploited Earth. Humans have been engaged in damaging their environment from the very beginning. The damage increased with the coming of the scientific age, therefore we now find ourselves in trouble. If a man is drowning in a river, then there is still a possibility that he may resurface, and get saved. It is up to us now, whether we want to act on the possibility of saving Earth. Circumstances are created from thoughts. If we want something then circumstances become favourable for it, and if we don't want something then circumstances become unfavourable for it. It is because of our own lack of understanding that we erred in the evaluation of reality, and the magnificence of the natural environment. As a result, we caused damage to nature and harmed ourselves in many ways. While causing this damage, we have been enjoying ourselves, but we are afraid also of the possibility of getting harmed ourselves. This is the analysis of the past.

When humans become ready for living in orderliness based on humane consciousness, only then Jeevan vidya is transmitted from one to another. Its evidence has come. We have been able to do this successfully in one school. Looking at the good results here, there is a need for its widespread dissemination.

No-one commits a wrong act without ignorance. According to me, every human wants good and takes responsibility for good. Hence, sooner or later humans will feel responsible for the good of all. Awakening of jeevan is only for actualising this universal good. This discussion about understanding and jeevan's awakening is initiated only with the intent of forming a healthy society and freedom from the traps of comfort-accumulation and devotion-detachment. The evidencing of enlightenment and resolve activities of buddhi can happen only when it attains the enlightenment of justice, dharma and truth. It is when these three are comprehended that buddhi is called sadbuddhi - whereby a human accepts responsibility for the good of all. It is upon comprehending existence that we become aware of it being eternally present as coexistence, which itself is the object of study.

The concept of splitting was arrived at by a mathematical approach. Nuclear fission or splitting of the atom was discovered for making increasingly more powerful nuclear bombs. The purpose of making atomic bombs can be nothing apart from destruction. Apart from destruction like Hiroshima, the nuclear tests that were carried out again and again have caused more damage to the environment. These acts were carried out by a very few people but their consequences will be borne by the entire world. This is how common people are harmed by these destructive acts. The mathematical approach reduces 'the present' to an infinitesimal duration, and 'the present' seems to disappear. While the reality is just its opposite. The present is eternal. There is nothing apart from the present. Entire grandeur of existence is eternally present, while the present becomes non-existent by approach of fragmenting. Such a big bundle of lies has been made this way, now humans will have to have confidence in their own selves to overcome it. As long as humans derive their confidence from an atom bomb, sword, flag or stone - they will not trust each other, it is a fact. Humans will have confidence in themselves when they understand themselves. In order to understand themselves, every man and woman will need to precisely understand justice, dharma and truth, which is the expression of jeevan. How do we understand justice, dharma and truth? Justice is understood on the basis of relationships. Dharma is understood on the basis of 'orderliness'. Truth is understood on the basis of existence. Coexistence is always effective, as a manifestation of coexistence. Apart from humans, the entire grandeur of the other three orders is in the form of orderliness only.

Humans too have an inherent thirst, to whatever extent, of being in orderliness. It is not possible to gain the concept of orderliness by studying the (prevalent) textbooks of delusion. It is only upon understanding the concept of orderliness and living thereby that humans become capable of abiding by dharma. Human dharma indeed is to live in 'orderliness'. Every entity in existence being in orderliness and participating in orderliness itself is seen in the form of dharma. Dharma of material order is existing (being). Dharma of biological order is growth with existing. Dharma of animal order is the hope of living along with growth and existence. Dharma of knowledge order (humans) is continuity of happiness along with hope of living, growth and existence. Happiness itself is the dharma of humans. How will happiness be achieved? Through resolution. Resolution will be achieved by living in orderliness. Living in orderliness depends on understanding in humans. Understanding is to have enlightenment of existence, jeevan and humane conduct (in buddhi).

Enlightenment of orderliness (in buddhi) naturally results in dedication and resolve in orderliness. Humans live in orderliness with this dedication and resolve, and by living thus we can create good conditions. Therefore, we will have to adopt humane education which will give rise to sadbuddhi in humans. There is no other way of saving this Earth from complete disaster. We should understand this proposal. It is needed. Circumstances will compel us to understand it if we don't pay heed now.

Therefore, abiding by dharma is to live in universal orderliness and indivisible society with evidence of resolution, prosperity, fearlessness and coexistence. In this way, I have understood humaneness to be the universal orderliness of humans. Human race is one – actions are many. Human dharma is one - resolutions are many. Unless humans recognise themselves as one race, how can they do anything good for all humans? Humans can perform many kinds of actions for living with happiness. The meaning of many kinds of actions means performing different works like tailoring, masonry, farming, etc. It is natural for humans to do many kind of works. Many kind of work here means production activities. We can accept the oneness of the human race by seeing that the objective of all humans is only one – which is to become happy, to become prosperous, to become resolved, to have fearlessness, and to continuously evidence coexistence. Any plan that we make for satisfying these objectives can only be based on the principle that “human race is one, human dharma is one.” The path to happiness is called dharma (orderliness). The way orderliness can be evidenced at one place and time upon becoming wise, it can be evidenced at every place and time. That is the beauty of this proposal.

May there be universal well-being!

Questions and Answers

This part of the book has a selection of some questions asked by students of Jeevan Vidya and their answers given by Shree A Nagraj.

Question: - Do material objects have no value?

Answer: - Usefulness value of material objects is definite. The usefulness value of one kilogram of wheat today is the same as what it was one hundred years ago. We only brought its value down by interfering in it (for example by using chemical fertilisers). People became averse to labour from using chemical fertilisers, as they stopped making manure from dung and started killing farm animals for their meat. They say, we make money by killing animals and exporting their meat etc. How far is that right? How far is that practical? How far is that good for humans? Who is answerable? For prosperity, it is essential that material objects have value - as the fruit of human labour. Material objects are used in three ways - the body's nourishment, protection and social participation. All these objects are to be used by humans, without these they cannot be fully happy.

Question: - What is dharma of humans, and what is faith?

Answer: - The dharma of all humans is happiness. Many faiths are there only because this fact is not understood and is not commonly accessible. The extent to which I live in abundance and in orderliness today, I can live even better tomorrow, such living with increasing happiness is called dharma. It is not possible to be happy with problems. One can become happy only upon attaining resolution from understanding. We attain resolution on the basis of material things and then become happy, it doesn't work like this. Understanding, hence resolution, is inherent in our buddhi through awakening. One becomes capable of producing and using material things righteously on the basis of understanding.

It is not possible to have a situation where we are resolved and we don't have any material things. Definite measures of material things meant for prosperity, are also included with resolution, which is evidenced while living in a family. It is with this balance that we pave the way of living with happiness. These material things (while living with resolution) are the needs of abiding in dharma.

Until now, no sectarian ritual could become universal, nor would they ever in future. Universality in humans will be only of orderliness, good of all, and happiness. I have understood the way humans live in orderliness and participate in universal orderliness. No one has any problems with me, the way I live. In this way, we come to this conclusion that the dharma of humans is happiness with resolution. Living in orderliness results in continuity of resolution and happiness. When jeevan becomes happy then resolution is evidenced in human behaviour. We can accept that a human is happy based on evidence in their behaviour.

All humans naturally want to be resolved and without exception want to be happy - whether they are dark, fair, mighty, weak, rich, or poor. Since time immemorial, the method of becoming happy has been to search for happiness in sensual pleasures, but that hasn't worked. Consequently, it has become clear now that understanding is the basis of becoming happy. Understanding is when humans have understood themselves and existence.

Existence is an eternal truth, which doesn't increase or decrease. What is the evidence of this? All that is there around us is the present. Present never ends, it is continuous. This Earth may have four orders or just one. At the minimum one order (material order) continues to remain. Physical entities continue to exist, these are never annihilated. The physical entities only manifest as chemical entities, which is called chemical resonance (rasaynik urmi). Two physical entities come together while leaving their prior conducts and making a third kind of conduct - that is chemical resonance. All entities of biological order were formed as a result of chemical resonance. The chemical entities naturally give rise to the emergence of pran-kosha, pran-sutra, and rachna vidhi. There is no contribution from any engineers, doctors or intellectuals in this. Hence, we come to know that the steps of development progression are well established in existence. Humans are also a step in this progression, you and I can understand this. If humans don't live in orderliness in their activities and thoughts, as per their position in development progression, then Earth will not remain habitable for them and humans will get wiped out. The rest of the physical and chemical entities will remain as is, but the human race will vanish from Earth. There is no gain or loss in existence, i.e. existence neither increases nor decreases. The four orders are continuously present. This is the way of existence. If all the four orders are not together on this Earth, they will be on some other planet. What would be more foolish than humans thinking that their development is in making Earth uninhabitable?

Most people consider a person, nation or sect that causes such nuisance to be developed. This requires some rethinking. It has now become evident that we are stuck due to our own doing. We need to untangle ourselves now. The proposal for this has been presented to you. It needs to be thought over and your cooperation is essential in this. Humans turn to good or bad tendencies with their own will. If they don't find the path to good, they rush towards bad tendencies. This proposal is for going towards good, it needs to be considered and its path needs to be recognised.

First – The humane character is the same for all humans. It is in the form of rightfully owned wealth, marital faithfulness, and kindness in work and behaviour.

Second – Values flow upon recognising relationships. Values are fulfilled upon recognition, evaluation and mutual satisfaction in relationships.

Third – We are ethical only when we make right-use and ensure protection of our resources in the form of body, mind, and wealth.

In this way, humane conduct is a combined expression of values, character and ethics. These three are the cornerstones for living in orderliness. Humane conduct is the formula and I arrived at the humane constitution when I elaborated it for human living in family, society, vocation and nature. The grandeur of humane conduct alone can be manifested as national character. The erstwhile thinking of statecraft based on religion and economics has failed. We will now need to search for the alternative. The proposal for this is to define the national character on the basis of humane conduct. Nowhere and at no point in time will anyone have difficulty in understanding it. For once, we need to experience the happiness of living with humane conduct. As we elaborate the humane conduct and the humane constitution in the form of the code of humane conduct, it takes the form of sociology. Education needs to incorporate humane sociology. How will humans become wise? What is the grandeur of a human with humaneness? How does a human with humaneness live in family, in society, and in systems? All this falls under sociology, which is a subject of study in itself. Humans can live very nicely while trusting the present. Existence neither increases nor decreases, therefore we can recognise existence in the form of the ultimate truth.

Nature saturated in Omnipotence itself is existence. The present can never be destroyed. We are intellectually unresolved in the present because of our inability to live in orderliness. We therefore escape to the past and the future (in our memory), which makes us frustrated and miserable. There is no disorder in existence. Existence is in absolute orderliness.

When a human constructs something, it inevitably deteriorates. For example, when one makes a machine, it eventually breaks down. When one constructs a house, it starts deteriorating after some time. However, matter is never destroyed. So even when a house is reduced to dust, we can reconstruct it with our labour. Jeevan has inexhaustible strengths and powers which we use for the nourishment and protection of the body and social participation. We call this prosperity. We may need to use the phone a few times a day, but the phone is available twenty-four hours a day - that's prosperity. Our requirement is to go out once a day, but the bicycle is available all day at home – if that's not prosperity, then what is it? We require only one quintal of grain for food, but our production is 20 quintals – that's prosperity. These examples illustrate that resources are plentiful, and needs are less. We can experience prosperity in all aspects of our living. Experiencing prosperity is a human need. If there is any use of the material world, then it is that humans may experience prosperity. There is only one way to experience prosperity, and that is to produce in excess of our family's needs. The continuity of resolution is ensured by living in orderliness with prosperity. Once understanding is attained, upon resolution, we have its eternal continuity and we don't need to strive for it anymore. This itself is the basis of feeling good. It is not possible to feel good whenever one thinks of a problem. In this way, understanding is the basis of resolution, deploying labour is the basis of prosperity, and living in orderliness with coexistence is the basis of experiencing fearlessness. This I have seen, understood, and lived - which I am capable of imparting to you.

Justice = Being capable of living in indivisible society and universal orderliness. Truth = Being capable of authenticity.

Being authentic means that what we have understood, we can impart it to others. The only formula for understanding is to understand orderliness, understand justice, and understand humans. I am among those who have become successful in understanding these.

The realisation results in evidence. What is realisation? Realisation is the point of satisfaction of knowing and believing. If we only keep believing, but don't know, then we won't find the point of satisfaction. If we know, but don't believe, then too we won't find the point of satisfaction. It is when we find satisfaction in both knowing and believing, that we find satisfaction in recognising and fulfilling. Thus far, we couldn't find satisfaction in the course of recognising and fulfilling, because we lacked knowing and believing. We either know but don't believe, or we believe but don't know. How to recognise the point of satisfaction of knowing and believing? It will be recognised through contemplation. That which gets accepted as enlightenment (in buddhi), we start its revelation within ourselves, which eventually reaches the point of satisfaction. The authenticity comes along with the point of satisfaction. Authenticity is evidence in itself. This is how the way of communicating and expressing the realisation emerges. We find satisfaction in ourselves upon communicating and expressing realisation in human tradition, which is our true wealth. I become satisfied when I could communicate my realisation to you, which itself is the evidence of my realisation. If you achieve this understanding, then it is further joy for me, and even if you don't understand, my satisfaction remains intact with me. We can communicate realisation eternally.

According to erstwhile idealism, the realisation cannot be expressed. On the basis of recognising jeevan, I understood that realisation is its integral activity. Evidence of realisation is possible only in the human tradition. Understanding is the only requirement for evidencing realisation, no material substance is required for this. Understanding is about knowing, believing, recognising and fulfilling. The activities of knowing and believing happen within jeevan. These activities are not based on sensory experience; therefore, they don't require any material substance. When it comes to recognising and fulfilling, we participate in orderliness as humans. Realisation has no deployment of the body. It directly makes the mun joyous. Mun, joyous from realisation, reveals it to the world. Realisation that happens in atma is the basis of being joyful. The majesty of atma itself is the basis of fascination and joy. Atma has the content of realisation, so mun offers it to the world. Mun has so much joy that it is bound to offer. When we have a bountiful amount of something we naturally offer it to others. Realisation is such a big bounty that mun can't contain it to itself and starts expressing it. I have seen, understood, and realised this. In the past, our elders kept stating that realisation cannot be expressed in words. We will now have to study which of these statements is to be believed. Realisation can be expressed if a human wants. It is clear that realisation can be expressed. The event is right before you.

After realisation, comes presenting it in the form of evidence. So far, evidence has been presented either as instrumental evidence or scriptural evidence. The evidence that can establish the truth hasn't yet been presented. It is a fact that instrumental evidence is variable. Scientists themselves say that it is not necessarily the final truth. Now it has become a big dilemma to understand what the final truth is, what is the initial truth, what is the in-between truth, what is the close-by truth, and what is the far-off truth? There is truth and there is untruth. Untruth means humans are living in delusion. There is no reality in existence by the name "untruth". We could call our ignorance and our delusion "untruth". Truth is all that exists. Truth neither decreases nor increases. There is no such thing as initial truth or final truth. There is only continuous truth. Or one can be in the state of not having understood the truth. Truth is realised only upon understanding. Understanding coexistence itself is the ultimate truth.

The result of understanding existence is realisation that existence is in orderliness itself. Since existence itself is in the form of orderliness, it is natural for humans to have an inherent tendency to strive for orderliness. Then we came to know that human dharma is only one, and it is living in orderliness. The triumph of human dharma is only in living in orderliness.

Trusting the present itself is being happy. However, there can be no evidence of being happy with the solution described in devotion-detachment. Sadhana culminates in detachment as the state of samadhi. It is impossible to say whether one is happy or unhappy in the state of samadhi. One cannot testify samadhi, therefore that state is said to be beyond happiness or unhappiness. If you attain the state of samadhi, you too will see the same. Samadhi is a state that is bereft of thoughts. I have seen it myself. Samadhi is a possible but not a definite event. No one can tell who will achieve the state of samadhi and when. It is not possible to say how one will achieve samadhi, since there are many methods for it – sadhana vidhi, agantuk vidhi, yog vidhi, dhyan vidhi, puja vidhi, japa vidhi.

When we start living in orderliness, our participation aligns with it. Participating in education-sanskar can be achieved through continuous benevolence. Education-sanskar is meaningful only through benevolence, not remuneration. Education-sanskar for remuneration cannot impart the enlightenment of truth and essential understanding. I impart education-sanskar benevolently, without expecting any material reward. Imparting understanding doesn't require material resources.

Teachers in educational programmes must be autonomous and self-reliant. Understanding that an autonomous person will naturally be self-reliant, produce essential goods, be capable, and benevolent. Every human has an inherent tendency for cooperation and benevolence, which can be surveyed. Benevolence can be taught to children based on this. By nurturing a child's cooperative tendencies, they naturally develop into benevolent adults. We need to create provisions in education to nurture this tendency, achievable only through humane education. Industrial and professional education cannot achieve this.

Focusing on this, we can develop education addressing behaviour, orderliness, and evidence. Humans must be the basis of evidence. Industrial and professional education cannot make humans social; it inevitably results in exploitation of the Earth. The Earth has been ruined by industrial and professional education. Therefore, we need humane education, behavioural education, resolutionistic education, and authentic education. Such education should centre around humane conduct. We need to develop comprehensive content to make humans wise and secure humane conduct.

We see that people perform acts of agitation and excitement instantly, but when it comes to actions requiring resolution, wisdom, or purposefulness, they think ten times over before acting. Such a tendency is not seen in childhood. As one grows older, doubts about one's cooperative nature begin to arise, and cooperation becomes less of a priority. Eventually, it is too late, and one's circumstances also change. The changed circumstances only reinforce one's doubts about the wisdom in cooperation, and slowly one takes a stand that nothing good is possible, or that we can't do anything good in this world. On the other hand, every human naturally wants orderliness. This proposal is for how orderliness can become accessible, and how it can become common. Humans will have to become wise for this. Orderliness is to evidence humane conduct in every aspect, angle, direction and context in human living. This results in resolution, prosperity, fearlessness and coexistence, for which humans have been striving and waiting for ages.

At present, people consider their own needs to be justified but not the needs of others. This is why one person exploits another, one family exploits another family, one community exploits another community, and one country exploits another country. This observation makes it clear that we need to understand and recognise human dharma and humane conduct, and muster dedication and courage to actualise it in this very lifetime. This is called resolve, which involves dedication for evidence. Dedication is required for living in orderliness and expressing authenticity. It also involves a continuous commitment to justice—living justly and striving for justice. This dedication will lead to justice, dharma, and truth. I do not see any other way to achieve this. Dedication in worship, recitation, and meditation only reinforces and enhances the needs for which we undertake these activities. It is said that these practices are performed to satisfy acute inquisitiveness for knowledge or for attaining moksha. Since time immemorial, these practices have been considered auspicious. They have popular acceptance and respect, and many people find relief in them. However, temporary relief does not mean that we have become capable of living in orderliness. It is not that I mistrust worship, recitation, meditation, etc., but they are effective only up to a certain limit. Beyond this, there is the desire for moksha, whose ultimate destination is samadhi, where there is nothing to gain or lose.

Therefore, we arrive at the conclusion that the path of devotion, detachment, or accumulation does not lead to orderliness. Then, how should humans live? The art of humane living is to live with resolution, prosperity, fearlessness, and coexistence. I have experienced living this way, and it is meaningful. You can also live it. We have reached the point where every person can evidence it by living it. Meaningfulness is acceptable and embraceable to all humans. Humane conduct is meaningful for humankind. Every unit in existence tends to be in orderliness, which itself is their dharma. Humans also want to live in orderliness, and on this basis, humaneness is acceptable to them. Evidencing humaneness itself is the evidence of our awakening.

When I evidenced humane conduct, I realised that humaneness itself is my identity and grandeur, and joy started flowing continuously. I believe the whole of humankind is also thirsting for humaneness. Humaneness is the identity of humans; they will not be able to run away from it. Sooner or later, they will have to come around to it.

Each human has the inherent possibility and the potential treasure for realising humane tradition. The evidence is based on each human's desire, need, and enthusiasm. If just one person had a propensity for orderliness while others went about their lives mechanically, then everyone wouldn't have had the need and desire for becoming happy.

Someone or the other has always occupied a seat of power, but even they didn't find happiness, self-governance, and freedom; and those who looked up to the seat of power also didn't find any of it. This tells us that all of us are still empty-handed. The only alternative for filling this void is that every human lives with developed consciousness. Humane education is the only way for human awakening. Whatever efforts I have made towards it are out of my happiness. I am not doing it as a favour or obligation. I profess this based on the enlightenment of realisation (realisation is authenticity, and its enlightenment happens in buddhi). This itself is called resolve. We have the desire to express and communicate our understanding based on this resolve. This also gives rise to a tendency for evidencing. I evidenced and found that it is everyone's need, and upon realising this, I started presenting its further programs.

The first endeavour is the Jeevan Vidya Plan. Here, I have explained the activities of jeevan, such as contemplation, resolve, and realisation. The resolve naturally manifests in that person in the form of visualisation as a way of living. Earlier, visualisation used to be based on sensitivity. Now, visualisation starts happening for a way of living with authenticity. Such living is called the way of benevolence. When we visualise our common and special aspirations through the way of benevolence, we realise that we can be benevolent only when we are autonomous, i.e., when we are evidencing resolution and prosperity. This ability cannot be hidden away, it gets naturally deployed in benevolence. Our common and special aspirations become limited in this way.

This formula of living encompasses cyclical economics, or it naturally leads to it. Humans can understand this, and it indeed becomes clear upon awakening. In this way, with cyclical economics, we devote our resources (body, mind and wealth) ethically in behaviour, production and orderliness. For example, we deploy our resources in education. Therefore, the opportunities for righteous deployment of resources are always there, and the way of availing these emerges on its own upon awakening.

In modern times, one gradually starts losing interest in production after their studies and thirsts for more and more comfort and accumulation. However, upon awakening through humane way of living in orderliness our common and special aspirations become limited (definite), i.e. our needs become satisfied with fewer resources.

The object value remains constant. For example, whatever value (usefulness) is there in one kilogram sesame seeds, it has always been the same. Similarly, the value of medicine, rice, wheat, vegetables, etc also remains constant. This is called usefulness value. Also, there are things that humans produce - such as cars, trains, etc. - where aesthetic value gets added. Aesthetics is meaningful when it adds convenience to usefulness. This is the basis of our analysis for recognising usefulness, meaningfulness and aesthetics.

Among the values, jeevan values are known by the names – happiness, peace, contentment and bliss, which are only names of the state of harmony within jeevan. Happiness is when there is harmony in mun and vritti, peace is when there is harmony in vritti and chitta, contentment is when there is harmony in chitta and buddhi, and bliss is when there is harmony in buddhi and atma. This altogether is harmony in jeevan. When we live based on realisation then it is effortless and natural for jeevan to be in harmony. This harmony is jeevan's natural expectation, accomplishment and meaningfulness. It is when the taste activity (of mun) starts having fulfilment of values, those are given names such as love, trust, affection, gratitude, guidance, etc. When relationships are meaningfully recognised then these values start flowing on their own from jeevan. For example, when a mother has recognised her child then motherly care starts surging by itself from her. No five-year plan is needed for that! We don't need to find or gather values from outside. Values are inherent in jeevan, which will get deployed when relationships are recognised. Recognition of relationships is for their purpose in family, society, systems, and coexistence. Relationships are anchored in these four ways.

We need to attain mastery with this. The extent to which we attain mastery, we become capable of evidencing and meaningfulness to the same extent. Thereby, we start experiencing values. Jeevan evaluates the values that emanate from itself. Object value is spread everywhere, while jeevan values, human values, and established values are inherent to jeevan, and jeevan itself performs their evaluation. It is such a natural and magnificent activity! No external instrument is needed for this evaluation. It is about examining the self, by the self, and for the self. Everyone needs this. We need a way to make this possibility accessible to all humans. Education-sanskar activities are carried out on matters of law, regulation, balance, and justice only. When these activities are duly carried out, jeevan becomes awakened and capable of recognising relationships. Humans recognise relationships for their purpose, and as a result, become happy. This is how we realise the taste activity of jeevan.

Next activity of jeevan is deliberation. The way of deliberation in animal consciousness is pleasure, health and profit, while the way of deliberation for humane consciousness is justice, dharma and truth. These are the reference points for humane living, which needs to be grasped and accepted. As we accept these, our efforts become channelised in this direction. Thus far whatever education, sanskar, and evaluation that humans did, it was done based on their sensitivity. This didn't suffice, therefore humane tradition could not materialise. Hence, the need is to dissolve the pleasure, health and profit in justice, dharma and truth in deliberation. This means pleasure, health and prosperity that is based on the perspective of justice. With the perspective of justice, prosperity replaces profit. We achieve prosperity through production with justice, while the way of accumulation leads to exploitation. By the way of exploitation, we damage ourselves and we inflict damage to the world as well. This needs to be clearly understood, accepted and this resolve needs to be firmly established. Therefore, there is a need for humane education. Every student will become autonomous by this, and they will have the following six merits.

|------------------------|-----------------------------|
| 1. Self-confidence | 2. Respect for Excellence |
| 3. Balance in Talent | 4. Balance in personality |
| 5. Social in Behaviour | 6. Self-reliant in Vocation |

Such an autonomous person shall evidence resolution and prosperity in their family, which naturally gives rise to a paradigm for society and systems. Family is the fountainhead of society and systems. I have seen this, it is thoroughly practical. Then comes design of systems. Understanding gives rise to these systems as a natural consequence.

Each child first receives education from their parents and guardians, this is followed by formal education at educational institutions, and finally by the seats of State and Religion which do so in their own ways. We have not become humane from all this education. Now this thought, effort, and evidence is only so that we could become humane, and tradition of humaneness comes about. The benefit this will lead to is - balance in the environment and establishment of justice in humankind. Living in justice invariably leads to orderliness. It's not such a big deal, is it? It is doable, but humans need to feel the need for it. Whatever humans have accomplished thus far is based on their sensitivity, but this approach cannot satisfy our true need. On the contrary, our sensitivity driven actions have ruined Earth, and in the process, doomed the human race. Therefore, if humans are to thrive then they will have to recognise humaneness. They will have to live in humane orderliness, which alone has the possibility of continuity. The present pressing issue is that crimes against the environment should stop.

The human systems are in the form of: -

1. participation in education-sanskar
2. participation in justice-security
3. participation in production-work
4. participation in exchange-reserve
5. participation in health-restraint

Participation in all these five systems itself is participation in orderliness. Such orderliness arises and is evidenced in each human upon awakening. This completes the summarised view of orderliness, which every wise person can accept.

Any issue is considered under research or exploration stage until it is fully understood. We already know how to disseminate the outcome of research or exploration by way of education-sanskar. The first priority, therefore, is disseminating the fruits of this exploration. The teachers, who are adept in academic methods, right behaviour, logic of wisdom and science, will disseminate this understanding. Being adept means having definitive understanding. After definitive understanding is attained, one evidences it with one's own tendency, effort, and need. The need for evidence is inherent in every human. How will you remain quiet after you have felt the absolute need for evidence? You will also become evidence. To begin with, I achieved this understanding by way of exploration; others will achieve it from me, academically. After this study, one becomes responsible upon attaining enlightenment. Evidencing is imminent after enlightenment. Upon attaining definitive understanding, when we become ready to evidence it and set forth to communicate it to the world, we attain realisation in the process. Students will attain enlightenment only after their teacher's realisation. In this way, every person will impart enlightenment to others only after they have attained realisation. Enlightenment will not happen merely by speaking. We listen to something, accept it, and then devote ourselves to exploration. This is the path I took. However, I believe most people will follow the path of study, realisation, and evidencing.

Question: There are prevalent traditions and there are common people trapped in them, what is your view about them?

Answer: You have used two words – “tradition” and “common people”. I understand tradition to be under four heads: 1. Education, 2. Religion, 3. State, 4. Commerce. These four seats are at the helm of tradition. They’re like the boats that each human sails on, at some point or the other. In my eyes, these traditions have become completely rotten and useless, with nothing to offer to those onboard. They keep bragging still that all their efforts are for our emancipation, even when we don’t find a single person becoming emancipated. Instead, the saviours themselves look drowned. On this basis, I have said that all traditions have become rotten and useless. The only source of meaningfulness is humans. I have studied that more than 51% in every human is meaningful. Humans can be reformed. Tradition, on the other hand, is beyond reform and a new tradition will have to be established. The prevalent tradition does not have the substance for reform.

The traditions of education and the State will remain whether they are meaningful or meaningless. The State at present is essentially a rule, the basis of which is a constitution, which is fundamentally power centric rule. The meaning of which is stopping one mistake by making another, stopping one crime by committing another, and stopping one war by waging another. What is there for humans in this? Will anything change by stopping? The more we tried to stop crimes and wars, the more they increased. It is for everyone to see.

Business cannot let go of its addiction to exploitation. Religion is addicted to giving assurances and getting respect. Their assurances are - we will emancipate the sinners, convert the selfish into benevolent, convert the ignorant into learned. There is no evidence of these assurances having been fulfilled. Humans have kept thinking - I am wrong, traditions are right. From now on, I want to awaken humans, not traditions. I don't deal with traditions. I am a human and I relate to humans.

Question: On one hand you say that traditions are rotten, then humans who are products of the same traditions should also be rotten. Still you say that humans are more than 51% right. What do you mean by that?

Answer: - The people at the helm of the four traditions that we spoke about, don't have inquisitiveness for reform. Those in the seats of power and the tenets of these seats don't have the basis of inquisitiveness. On this basis I say that these have become rotten. While every human has the spark of inquisitiveness in some corner. On this basis I say that humans are more than 51% right.

Question: You have talked about “development”. So far development has meant construction of a road, getting electricity to a village or an increase in household income. What is “development” according to you?

Answer: - Development in humans fundamentally means the development of consciousness. However, we have been calling the construction of roads and buildings development. Moreover, the construction of a jail in every district is also called development! A bright new house is called development. I do not oppose this material development because these are part of humans' common and special aspirations. However, using these developments rightly requires social consciousness. With mechanistic consciousness, we will inevitably fall into errors and crimes. Humans need social consciousness, behavioural consciousness, and orderliness consciousness. The Jeevan Vidya proposal is about understanding developed consciousness. After this, there is a proposal for the humanisation of education and a family-based self-governing system. Considering these three proposals, we can see that the lesser the damage we inflict on Earth, the longer we will last on it. After all, where will humans live if we ruin this Earth? Therefore, humans are “developed” when they live with resolution and prosperity in their families, identify all humans as one race, have harmony in their behaviour, and evaluate one another rightly, i.e., when they are social. Orderliness in humankind means their being able to participate in all the five aspects. This is what I call human development or awakening. This is the meaning of being social. We haven't yet found happiness in our notions of “development”. Resolution, prosperity, fearlessness, and coexistence all should be accomplished for continuous happiness. Happiness will not be found without this.

Question: Darwin also gave a theory of evolution which is still widely accepted. How is your principle of evolution different from Darwin's theory of evolution?

Answer: Darwin's presentation is limited to describing the evolution of species based on their bodily structure. For example, the body of an insect, a leech, a horse, a cow, and similarly, the body of a human. He made the skeletal structure the basis of his study. He tried to explain evolution in terms of how the bones in organisms have become longer and stronger, considering the human body as the most evolved and placing prior species in a chronological sequence. The Darwinian narrative about the evolution of the body has a few issues, but his description of humans is completely wrong. According to Darwin, the gradual transformation of apes resulted in the human body, and in this process, a number of intermediate body forms came about, which eventually perished.

However, according to me, humans emerged from the womb of some animal with an evolved brain, where the objective of exploration in pran-sutras was to establish a species tradition where jeevan could evidence its awakening. In contrast, Darwin's theory claims that a number of indefinite body forms evolved due to pressure from the environment and natural surroundings. Darwin didn't know about jeevan. He didn't use jeevan as a reference. Human is a combined form of jeevan and body. Scientists are still searching for traces of evolution by studying body and bones, and they give Nobel prizes, degrees, and jobs for these! They consider the human body as the reference for evolution. If that were so, humans should have reached their potential along with the evolution of the human body. But that didn't happen. Humans don't get fully defined within the purview of the body or skeleton. As proof, Darwin himself has written that “I myself don’t get described within a framework of bones.” He was incapable of describing humans.

You call betterment in rachna vidhi as development, while it is ‘jeevan’ that is the reference point of development. The body cannot function at all without jeevan. Jeevan itself keeps the body alive. Neither just the body nor just jeevan is the basis of humans. Humans are combined expressions of jeevan and body.

The development in atoms is meant for achieving constitutional completeness. Every atom is constituted of two or more atomic particles. Each atomic structure has a nucleus and particles orbiting around it, which naturally occurs in existence. These atoms contain at least two or more particles. Among many types of atoms, jeevan is one type. In a jeevan atom, there is no increase or decrease in the number of particles, which is why it possesses inexhaustible strength and power. This is called ‘development in an atom’. Thus, we call jeevan a ‘developed’ atom. Awakening happens after development. The evidence of awakening lies in knowing and believing. Recognising and fulfilling activities occur in atomic particles. One atomic particle recognises another, maintaining orderliness by staying at a definite distance from each other. This is known as physicochemical activity. The most evolved physicochemical form on this Earth is the human body. The delusion lies in jeevan believing itself to be the body.

Question: You had met the Chief Justice of India, Sri Venkatachalliah, in Delhi and asked him about universal justice, to which he had no answer. Justice varies between India and Pakistan, and even within India, there are separate codes of justice for Hindus and Muslims. There is a lot of confusion about what justice actually means. You have stated that justice is evidenced in the family, while we think justice is delivered in courts. Please clarify this.

Answer: The essence of justice lies in "Relationships, Values, Evaluation, and Mutual Satisfaction." It is crucial to have evaluation and mutual satisfaction in relationships. Humans are inherently related with both insentient and sentient nature, whether we accept it or not. For example, our relationship with the air. It is impossible to envisage a world where humans do not have any relationship with their natural surroundings and other humans. All these aspects of justice are inherently present within the family. In contrast, courts deliver judgments, not justice.

Question: Your entire postulation is based on coexistence. You've said that nature exists within Omnipotence. Therefore, coexistence is all that exists. You say Omnipotence is present in places where no units are, as well as in places that are fully packed with units. Please explain this.

Answer: - The concept of omnipresent reality (Omnipotence) is easy to understand. We can refer to it as Space, Omnipotence, Paramatma, or God. What is this reality? It is the fundamental reality, it is energy. This reality is such that all units within it can be inspired by it. How does nature get inspired by Omnipotence? Does it apply a force? There is a hypothesis that it all started with a Big Bang, and the resulting force initiated everything one by one. Omnipotence (Space) does not possess any attribute to apply force. There are no waves, motion, or pressure in Space, so the idea of applying force doesn't arise. Every entity is energized, active, and inspired within Omnipotence, and this is evident. It is present everywhere. Every unit is immersed in and surrounded by Omnipresence. Units are distinct from one another because Omnipotence exists between them. If Omnipotence were not present, they wouldn't be distinct. The joining of units occurs because Omnipotence exists in between. This way, there is a basis for the composition and decomposition of entities in nature. Entities are fully energized and therefore active.

This reality was re-examined in another way. Firstly, there are entities in the form of units, which have a certain volume. Secondly, there is Omnipresence. The question was considered whether these have the same volume or different. Omnipresence is boundless, so there is no way to measure its volume.

According to materialism, where units exist, there is no space, meaning units displace space. Therefore, materialism considers units mightier (heavier) than space. However, in reality, as I observed, all units exist in a state of zero-attraction. Earth, Sun, solar systems, and galaxies are all in a state of zero-attraction. Zero-attraction is the absolute state, indicating that there is no weight in the coexistence of Omnipotence and units. Weight becomes evident only in the interaction of units. For example, weight is evident in the mutuality of two atoms due to their tendency to form molecules. Similarly, weight is evident among molecules due to their tendency to form definite compositions. This manifestation of weight in the mutuality of units is commonly called the gravitational force. In reality, it indicates participation in the development progression or universal orderliness. For example, a stone dropped from a height within Earth's environment falls to Earth due to its inherent tendency towards development. This inherent tendency is commonly called gravitational force. We understand from these two evidences that everything in nature is active. Omnipotence is permeative, its testimony is that each unit is active, regulated, and full of strength. Wherever a unit may be situated in existence, its regulation, activity and strength remain as it is – which is also the testimony of permeative-ness of Omnipotence.

Question: - You have postulated – “Infinite units are immersed, surrounded and soaked in Omnipotence, and these units are also illuminated from infinite angles in mutuality.” Please explain this.

Answer: - I have written an axiom here - Each unit is illuminated in infinite angles. Infinite angles extend in all directions as straight lines from an entity and its image remains to be there on those straight lines. The angle extends to another entity at some place. So, the image of the unit is there on the entity to which the angle extends. This way, it is evident that each entity is illumined. The evidence that each entity is illumined proves that illumination is inherent in all units. In this way, the infinite angles within every unit are in the sense of illumination only. As a result of your image on me, I am able to understand your illumination.

Question: Today, the whole world is running after making a profit, be it in business, employment, or even education, which you have termed 'profit-obsession'. This has led to social, economic, and environmental crises globally. Where can we find their solution? What is the alternative if the world wants to escape this vicious cycle of profit-making?

Answer: - If something fails, we can strive again for success. Humans are trapped in a state of goal-lessness and direction-lessness. They have not only lost their sense of purpose and direction, but their plans and programs also lack certainty. Certainty in any program can only be achieved when the goal is stable and the direction is clear. Essentially, what is required is a harmonious alignment of science with wisdom and wisdom with science, like a symphony in motion. That is the key. If we search for the goal of the current profit-obsessed economic system, we find it is only about accumulation, comfort, consumption, and over-consumption, which can never provide true satisfaction. There is no point of contentment in accumulation and comfort. Not a single person among the 7 billion on this Earth has found or can find true satisfaction in accumulation and comfort.

This is evidence of the goal-lessness and direction-lessness prevalent today.

If the goal and direction are definite, then our program is also definite. I call the current situation profit-obsession because satisfaction will never be achieved here, but we will keep running like mad. This is what obsession means. I have seen this madness. You must also see it. This craze for profit keeps increasing; it never slows down. What goal will we achieve by increasing this madness? At what point will we find satisfaction? Even if we achieve accumulation and comfort, they can only be used within the realm of consumption, multi-consumption, and over-consumption. It has no other endpoint. No one has ever found satisfaction from consumption. These two observations lead me to conclude that the current situation is nothing but an obsession. If all 7 billion people on this planet become obsessed this way, who will rescue them? In an attempt to find the answer to this question, my research shows that each human desires universal good, happiness, certainty, and its continuity. All of this combined is the subject of this exploration (of Madhyasth Darshan). The economic system is just one part of this entire picture.

Resources are in the form of body, mind, and wealth. All three must be considered. Economics cannot exist if any one of these is left out. The economics we have studied so far focuses on money as the primary resource. Money is classified into two types: (1) metal, and (2) paper. Paper money is produced in printing presses, and with the widespread accessibility of printing technology, counterfeit money has become a problem. Therefore, modern economics, which is highly praised, is essentially the science of currency notes and coins. We may possess all the currency notes and coins, but they cannot quench our thirst or fill our stomachs unless we obtain the desired goods with them. So, what is money? Money is merely a symbolic unit for exchange. Having a symbol is not the same as having the real thing. Believing that money can buy anything is madness. To resolve this issue, I propose that economic resources should be understood as body, mind, and wealth. Here, wealth refers to common aspirations (food, shelter, and clothing) and special aspirations (telecommunication and transportation). In the proposed system, the items we need will be used rather than hoarded. For example, we can store the grain we grow for one year, two years, or even four years, but if we keep it for longer, it will rot. Similarly, a machine or instrument will rust and become unusable if not used. Therefore, everything we produce is meant for use, not hoarding. Even if we were to hoard, it can only be done to a certain extent. The more we hoard, the more problematic it becomes. Therefore, using resources becomes inevitable. All produce beyond what is needed for use can be employed for right-use and purposeful-use.

I have observed something wonderful - the mind is necessary for producing anything. Along with the mind, the body is necessary for production. It is only with the union of the mind and the body that all production happens. In this way, we can clearly accept the concept that produced objects are wealth, which means objects of common and special aspirations. What will be the benefit of this decision? It will turn humankind's mind towards production. We are discouraging and destroying the production tendency in humankind by propagating modern economics in education with fanfare. After this, they talk of specialisation, which destroys production tendencies even further. The specialist, whose production tendencies have been destroyed, is believed to be superior. These so-called superior people demand everything while not doing any production themselves. In fact, they have the maximum demands. In this way, the anti-production tendency and lust for consumption together lead to revolt, rebellion and exploitation with the world. This is the way humans are trapped. They want to become free from this. I have attained this freedom. I have no need to exploit anyone, nor do I have any need to do any revolt or rebellion. I produce in excess of my needs with my labour. So can you. Needs are ascertained only at the level of the family, and not individually or at any other level. We experience prosperity upon producing more than the family's requirements. Hence, the need to contemplate Cyclical Economics was felt. It has been articulated in Hindi and offered to the world. If it is understood by people, it will lead to the good of all. It will not cause any harm to any person or any family anywhere. If anything, it will only result in good. Everyone needs to be free from the way of exploitation. Everyone needs to be free from the way of revolt and rebellion. The strategies adopted by politics will never result in fearlessness and peace anywhere. Peaceful living requires a cyclical economic system. For example, we deploy our resources in the form of body, mind, and wealth on natural abundance for production, and the produced goods become the basis of nourishment and protection of our body and social participation. We again become capable of producing on the basis of this social participation, nourishment, and protection. In this way, it is cyclical. Goods are produced when humans deploy their labour on natural abundance through body and mind. We become free from whining when we realise that we can always produce more than our requirements.

We have always desired satisfaction; we have always wanted to be happy. Therefore, we keep searching for ways to achieve satisfaction, and when we find a way, we adopt it. It is not about giving up anything. It is about converting wrong into right, crime into justice, war into peaceful coexistence, revolt into cooperation, and rebellion into friendship. We naturally accept these changes. Ask any of the 7 billion people in the world if they want revolt, rebellion, exploitation, and war. All of them will say no. In my view, no one wants to keep whining all the time. The cyclical economic system can liberate humankind from whining, revolt, rebellion, exploitation, and war. Just as a sick person desires to be healthy, humans inherently desire a cyclical economic system even while living in a profit-obsessed economic system. It is about awakening that inherent desire within us. A cyclical economic system is an inseparable aspect of human awakening. Its basic principle is “production by deployment of labour and exchange based on labour.” We should produce goods for our common and special aspirations based on this principle. The cyclical economic system is sustainable, natural, aligned with destiny, and co-existentially harmonious. Therefore, we should study it thoroughly, actualise it in our lives, and, after becoming satisfied, become a source of satisfaction for others.

Question: Upon seeing the inequality and misery among humans, Karl Marx gave the concept of “Dialectical Materialism” which was propagated as communism. It envisioned a utopian world, in which a political system would emerge from this communist ideology that will overcome economic disparity among humans. In the last 70 years, two-thirds of the world adopted communism, and some profound experiments were carried out based on it. Due to this, millions of people suffered enormous hardships, being hypnotised with the hope of bringing that utopia to reality. We can now say that communism, at least in its experimental form, failed miserably. We, the people of the world, have demonstrated that conflict cannot be the foundation for happiness in human life. We have heard you say that “Behaviour Centred Public Discourse” can take humans to resolution by dispelling problems and discords amongst them. You have tried to say this again and again. Can you please elaborate on its true form?

Answer: - The hypothesis of dialectical materialism is that everything functions through conflict. Practically, this can be seen as: you exert force on me, and I exert force on you, and thus both of our actions continue. This has been the thought process: both progress together or one perishes while the other progresses. According to this belief, only the strong are fit to exist, while the weak are not.

I have seen that there is no conflict in existence. Each unit has inherent strength. Even a subatomic particle has inherent strength, as do atoms, molecules, and bodies composed of molecules—all possess inherent strength. They are capable of achieving complementarity through mutual offering and acceptance, leading to progress. If they had understood existence, they couldn't have written dialectical materialism. Misuse of intellect leads to the belief that we alone will remain, rule the Earth, and all others will perish, that our religion will remain while all other religions will perish. We hear such boastful slogans daily. These slogans haven't provided us with any definite direction or goal, nor will they ever.

A definite program can only arise when our direction and goal are clear. I have studied this and impart accurate understanding to those who wish to study. This is my daily work. It's not as if I am doing you a huge favour. Just as air does its work, and water does its work, I do my work. I am firmly convinced that whatever work I have done, and for however long, has been for this understanding and objective. Through this, I find resolutions easily at every turn, in every issue, work, behaviour, production, and exchange. I am happy because of this, and so is my family. I see that every family wants to be happy. Every human being wants to be happy and wise; no one wants to be a fool. Even if you call a fool a 'fool', he will curse you and call you a fool in return. This happens because no one accepts what is unacceptable. Foolishness, conflict, revolt, rebellion and fighting are unacceptable to me. Materialism asserts that nothing can happen without revolt and rebellion. In contrast, Resolution Centred Materialism posits that everything in existence has inherent strength. This inherent strength manifests as use, right-use, and purposeful-use, which are the natural essences of an awakened life.

The main issue is whether science can be aligned with wisdom. Wisdom means recognition of the purpose. Purpose should align with science, and science should align with wisdom. Science aligned with wisdom means humans becoming capable of analysing purposes. Until science can analyse purposes, its logic is incomplete.

So far, proponents of science have claimed to provide logical materialism. If that is true, the first logical question is: what am I? Who am I? Why am I? How do our peace, unrest, happiness, and unhappiness arise? Why do we suffer? Why do we feel happy? Science does not provide answers to these questions. We cannot reach the truth by starting with a lie. There is resolution, destiny, and the course of destiny in existence. The course of destiny means movements towards resolution, which I have tried to explain in Resolution Centred Materialism.

Behaviour Centred Public Discourse is also written on the same basis. Humans want to become happy, and resolution = happiness, problem = unhappiness. One must have resolution. How will resolution happen? It will happen through behaviour. How will that happen? We will become resolved through relationship, values, evaluation and mutual satisfaction. We remain afflicted with problems as long as we don't recognise relationships and till we don't fulfil values according to relationships. Resolution happens when relationships, values, evaluation, and mutual satisfaction come together. This coming together transforms four problems into one resolution. Humans have become buried under problems. Anywhere you see there are only problems and humans are nowhere to be seen. The result is endless social, political, cultural and economic problems that have eclipsed humans. Every human life ends struggling with problems generation after generation. Its alternative, Behaviour Centred Public Discourse postulates that humans become resolved through behaviour. Behaviour happens in our relationship with humans and in our relationship with the natural surroundings. All our behaviour with natural surroundings has to be according to law, regulation and balance for us to find resolution, otherwise we become afflicted from problems there - which is our present condition. We engaged in industrial activity without right understanding, tore Earth's guts apart, and as a result we are suffering. These problems have raised a question mark on human survival on this planet. In my view, every human can become resolved, irrespective of who they are and what they do. That's what is postulated in Behaviour Centred Public Discourse. Its essence is - relationships, values, evaluation and mutual satisfaction. This itself leads to our attaining all round resolution. Economic resolution comes from understanding the cyclical nature of nature. A cultured way of living is achieved through Psychology of Humane Consciousness. Humans are units of the knowledge order; therefore, they can evidence themselves only through cognitive ability. It is about recognising relationships, having trust in the present, living in orderliness and evidencing coexistence. In this way, Behaviour centred Public Discourse has been postulated for comprehensive resolution.

Question: Freud has put forth a postulation which claims that all desires of humans have a single origin, and that is sex. People worldwide have accepted this ideology in a declared or undeclared way. However, we see that it has not resulted in a clear and resolving contemplation about humans. You have talked about "Psychology of Humane Consciousness." How will this replace Freudian psychology? How will humans achieve peace and happiness by understanding it, and how will humankind find the right direction?

Answer: Every human is a combined form of jeevan and body, as has been explained. Jeevan is essentially a constitutionally complete atom.

An insentient atom itself undergoes transcendence and becomes sentient (jeevan). It is then that nature achieves the grandeur of its sentient form. A constitutionally complete atom is free from molecular and gravitational bonds, and this itself is its grandeur. It becomes capable of driving a body with an evolved brain through coexistence. Both body and jeevan are definite accomplishments in the course of destiny in existence. Humans and animals are combined forms of jeevan and body. This has been thoroughly observed and can be studied. This study focuses on understanding the statuses of being alive, not being alive, being with jeevan, and being without jeevan. The evidence of being with jeevan is understood from sensory activity. When jeevan cannot express itself through the body or when sensory activities cease, we declare that the person is no more. Death means jeevan has left the body.

Death is proclaimed from the instant that jeevan separates from the body. We don't call that body to be human. Human is recognised while jeevan is driving the body. Every human is a thinking entity. Animals don't have any scope for imaginative thinking. The conscious activity in animals is only in the form of species conformity. Even if humans want to live like animals, the reach of their imaginativeness and free will goes far beyond that limit. As human thought was never contained within the purview of the body, it was natural for us to spread out far and wide. We (Jeevan) could not be limited by the body due to this reason. We could not become satisfied and resolved by thinking within bodily limits for the same reason. Its testimony is that we neither became social nor the indivisible society materialised. We didn't achieve universal orderliness. The orderliness of dogs is universal, orderliness of horses is universal, and orderliness of every animal is universal. Why are humans so unfortunate that their orderliness cannot be universal? Each entity in existence - donkey, horse, dog, grass, stone, iron, gems - has its use, and they are complementary to one another. How is it possible to be a human and not be complementary?

Thinking is intrinsic to us. We humans cannot remain silent. Silencing thoughts is not in our hands. Being silent is anti-nature, anti-destiny, anti-progress, and anti-awakening. In this way, humans become antagonistic in these four ways by pursuing silence. Antagonism naturally gives rise to problems, which is what happened.

Many people have pursued the state of samadhi in our country. When it came to giving evidence of their having achieved the state of samadhi, some have given it as well, albeit in a roundabout way. However, no one could clearly declare that, "I have achieved the state of samadhi. The result of it is precisely this, and I am its evidence." Then came the divine incarnations. All the documents of divine incarnations in human form are the ultimate flights of human imagination. This was done only for the good, but it didn't result in the good of all. This means, it didn't result in evidence of resolution, prosperity, fearlessness, and coexistence. Indivisible society and universal orderliness could not be evidenced. Every human didn't become capable of testifying of having become wise. Everyone didn't achieve happiness, peace, contentment, and bliss. It is from this standpoint that I am talking about the failure of these efforts. Its opposite, materialism talked of accumulation and comfort – which also didn't work, and that too has come to the brink of failure. Success comes only from humane consciousness.

Where does humane consciousness reside? It resides in jeevan, not in the body. Therefore, Freud, the person you mentioned, has nothing to do with jeevan. If sexual lust is all that jeevan desires, then this is already present in animals like dogs and cats. So, what was the need for the emergence of humans in the course of destiny? If we pose this question, the only logical conclusion is that human existence has no purpose. How are humans different from animals then? The goal of humans is to become happy. To achieve happiness, they need resolution. No person can evidence prosperity without resolution. Prosperity without resolution is not possible. Therefore, we need to think about this. Upon thinking, I understood that humane consciousness comprises conscience and sensitivity. Conscience has two aspects: (1) knowing, and (2) believing. Sensitivity also has two aspects: (1) recognising, and (2) fulfilling. All efforts and propensities of sensorial living are based on bodily senses. Therefore, all decisions based on sensitivity will have temporary validity; they will not have continuity. For example, eating feels good, but one can't keep eating all the time. Sleeping feels good, but one can't keep sleeping all the time. Likewise, there is no sensory activity that we could maintain forever in the same way; it needs to change repeatedly. It is not possible for humans to remain indulged in any sensory activity without change. Why do we have this complication? This is meant to orient humans towards humane consciousness. The transient nature of sensitivity is such a wonderful provision in humans, serving as an alarm, an inspiration, and a direction for their awakening. This applies to both you and me. When this awakening arises in you, and when you will testify to it - that is for you to think about.

Understanding this is your responsibility. I have accomplished all this, so it is natural for me to feel thrilled. It is so systematic! With a bit of thoughtfulness, anyone can grasp this. On that basis it became clear that the sensitivity is transient, while what we want is the continuity of happiness. We get a glimpse of happiness but there is no realisation of happiness through sensitivity. Our thirst is for happiness, which cannot be quenched without realisation. Realisation is continuous; it does not break apart. On this basis, it was needed for the continuity of happiness. The transience of sensations is natural and part of the inherent order. Based on this, we could evaluate its true value.

After this, I found the meaning of conscience, which is when all activities of jeevan become infused with realisation. This itself is humane consciousness or awakened consciousness. I have myself realised it. I impart its study to you. It can only be achieved through dedicated study. Reading and reciting this repeatedly can aid in understanding.

Understanding jeevan establishes the foundation of humane consciousness. When humane conduct is understood, it forms the basis of humane tradition. Without understanding humane behaviour and humane conduct, humane tradition is not going to happen. Humane conduct is universally consistent across all times and places. It combines values, character, and ethics. Character entails rightfully owned wealth, marital faithfulness, and kindness in actions and behaviour. Ethics involve the right-use and protection of body, mind, and wealth. Values are about evaluation and achieving mutual satisfaction in relationships. The goal of jeevan is happiness, and the human goal is resolution, prosperity, fearlessness, and coexistence. Ethics are essential for achieving these goals and give them purpose. This applies equally to values and character. We experience unhappiness when there is lack of character, unethical behaviour, and disregard for values. Therefore, living with values, character, and ethics is the essence of humane conduct and intrinsic human nature. To live in this manner, one needs knowledge of existence, jeevan, and humane conduct.

What is knowledge? Knowing and believing constitute knowledge. It is only after knowing and believing that one seeks the point of satisfaction. If we neither know nor believe, why and where would we search for the point of satisfaction? For instance, we know and believe in Delhi, which allows us to make plans to visit Delhi. If we neither know nor believe in Delhi, how could we make such plans? Similarly, we believed in the existence of the Moon, and we have reached there. We undertake many efforts to reach the point of satisfaction that comes from knowing and believing. The main proposition here is that coexistence is understood from understanding existence, thereupon humane conduct emanates. Psychology of Humane Consciousness explains all these. Additionally, I have seen 122 conducts in jeevan. How many of these 122 conducts happen in mun, how many in vritti, how many in chitta, how many in buddhi, and how many happen in atma - I have tried to explain it. What is its purpose? The purpose is that as one listens and gradually understands, they seek the point of satisfaction, achieved through realisation. This process then enables one to impart enlightenment to others. Our understanding is evidenced by our ability to enlighten others. Teaching others demonstrates our comprehension. Our health is evidenced by our ability to help others become healthy. Our wealth is evidenced by our ability to help others become wealthy. This is a simple way of becoming social.

Thus far, humans have only lived within the purview of sensitivity; hence the issues of accumulation, comfort, revolt-rebellion and exploitation have kept coming up. Thus, the essence of Psychology of Humane Consciousness is understanding jeevan's activities. When we believe for knowing, then we start living based on knowing, and as we go about recognising and fulfilling - we become just, regulated, balanced and happy. This sums up the purpose of "Psychology of Humane Consciousness".

Question: There are thousands of medical practices on Earth, and a lot of human effort and money have gone into these. In spite of this, the health of the human race is still poor. Despite massive investments and the development of advanced instruments, the number of diseases is only increasing. New diseases are emerging constantly. The old techniques do not achieve the results they claim, and modern techniques also do not deliver on their promises. In light of this, how do you recognise health and restraint according to Jeevan Vidya?

Answer: - What you have described is a concern for almost everyone. All these efforts are aimed at specialisation. However, specialisation is like a monster, it can be as destructive as a demon. The belief that "we are specialists, therefore whatever we say is right" has resulted in numerous offences, especially against those who are ill. When patients try to explain their ailments, doctors often prefer to rely on machines rather than listen to them. Machines cannot understand human suffering. Only a human can truly listen to and comprehend another human's pain. Therefore, accurate diagnosis cannot be achieved solely through the use of instruments.

In the past, the attempts by some people to diagnose ailments through Ayurveda, Unani, and other methods based on the knowledge of the pulse were commendable. They tried to identify illnesses by observing the rate, pressure, flow, strain, and tension of the pulse, which was praiseworthy. However, over time, doctors found pulse diagnosis challenging and shifted towards the ease of instrumental diagnosis.

Now, everyone wants to use instruments to diagnose and understand disease. Decisions based on instruments fail to satisfy the patient, and the doctor remains distant from recognising the root cause of the disease. When it comes to drug discovery, research, and advancements in medical science, it often misses the point. What needs to be observed is the holistic suitability or adversity of these treatments for patients, but this is not always the case. All specialists have become stuck in the pursuit of comfort and accumulation. A specialist in a big city prescribes the same medicine and treatment as a small-town doctor but charges a hundred times as much. Patients, too, think that a doctor who charges more is better! Do you see this madness? Thirdly, they have never tried to think holistically in medical science, meaning they've never thought of being true doctors, they have never even tried.

Holistic medical science means to first recognise the state of good health. Thereafter we assess the state of ailment, which is done by reading the pulse of the patient, then upon matching it with the patient's symptoms – the disease is diagnosed, and a treatment is given. If the treatment is successful, our understanding will be considered right, otherwise, it is considered wrong and further research is needed. This is in contrast with what is prevalent today, where the doctors say that they are right irrespective of the success or failure of their treatment. This lack of accountability is dangerous.

So, holistic medical science is coming together of – (1) diagnosis of disease, (2) assessment of the state of ailment, (3) identification of medicines, (4) identification of potency and combination of medicines, (5) identification of how the medicine is to be administered, (6) identification of the patient's state of mind, (7) identification of diet regimen, (8) identification of the restraint that the patient needs to follow, (9) then identification of the way treatment is to be given. Any disease can be treated fully with yoga and medicine. The other two aspects in Ayurveda – gem therapy and mantra therapy have limited use. Gem therapy only talks of rays and radiations. Mantra therapy primarily affects the mind. Medicine is the most potent way of treating diseases as it dissolves in bodily fluids.

The body has an inherent orderliness and the knowledge of healing it from diseases is intrinsic to it. Doctors often force treatments upon the body rather than assisting it in its natural healing process. What should a doctor do? They should support the body's inherent order by providing suitable substances that strengthen the body's condition. This is the true skill, wisdom, and science of a physician. With such an approach, we can overcome diseases. Therefore, we should move away from specialised medicine and make it universally accessible.

Health pertains to the body, while restraint pertains to the mind. Restraint is based on law, justice, regulation, and balance. Mentality that operates in a balanced and just manner is known as restraint.

What is the remedy for this? Understanding is the remedy. Imbalance and mental disorders arise from lack of understanding, while balance comes from understanding. Understanding encompasses the entire orderliness and balance.

May there be universal well-being!
